My speech comes from a Hampshire perspective. My constituency is admirably served by the Hampshire constabulary and a competent police authority. I shall make just three points. The first is somewhat technical. I hope that the Minister will be able to reply later in the debate or, if not, through correspondence in due course. The Government announced a three-year freeze in the standard spending assessment methodology, but it is unclear precisely how that affects the police SSA. In each year since 1995–96, the percentage of police SSA distributed on 1994 officer establishment has been decreasing by 10 per cent.—50 per cent. in 1995–96, 20 per cent. in the financial year that ends shortly and 10 per cent. next year.

Some police authorities are confused about whether that annual 10 per cent. drop constitutes a change in methodology, and will therefore be frozen, or whether it is an inherent part of the methodology, and will therefore continue. According to one's interpretation, Hampshire is looking at the loss of a not insignificant £1.8 million.

Secondly, even if we disregard the methodology issue, the Government's pronouncements on future funding give rise to very great concerns about both the quality of policing and establishment levels. During the 17 years of Conservative government, spending on the police, as hon. Members on both sides of the House have acknowledged, increased each year by an average of 3.4 per cent. over and above inflation. As a result of the comprehensive spending review, however, we are considering increases for the next three years that are only marginally above the rate of inflation. That must be compared with the 6.1 per cent. increase which the Association of Chief Police Officers estimates is required to maintain the existing quality of services and to take on new pressures.

Under Conservative—and, to be fair, for a period, under Liberal—control, Hampshire county council and Hampshire police authority made the maintenance of its combined establishment of civilian and officer manpower a priority. Modest progress was made in just four years; a little under 200 new posts were created. The question now facing us is how sustainable is that increase. Given increases that barely match inflation, some would say that we face a doomsday scenario. The present establishment and quality of service cannot be maintained without the most serious implications for council tax. The so-called 2 per cent. efficiency drive is likely to compound the problem instead of curing it because, as the Audit Commission found, little more than a quarter of 1 per cent. of efficiency savings is to be found.

Therefore the reality behind the Government's rhetoric appears to be lower service, poorer-quality, fewer officers and higher council tax.

In the next few years, identifiable budget pressures will make it even harder to maintain today's establishments. I shall not go into details because the Minister of State is aware of the arguments. There is worry about the funding on public safety of the radiocommunications project, once it is up and running—worry about whether there are adequate funds for it within the financial settlement envisaged for 2000-01. There are capital implications as well as current spending implications. There are similar worries about funding of the National Crime Squad and the National Criminal Intelligence Service. If there are to be increased overheads as a result of expansion and for other reasons, those must be met by increased levies on local police authorities.

The Labour election manifesto made much of a pledge to promote law and order. In reality, the Treasury must work on the budgets. In the words of the Police Federation press release of 2 December,

> "This will result in fewer police officers, the closure of local stations and a reduction in front line services."

So much for being tough on crime.

3.1 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): This debate on policing matters is especially opportune. Although Labour Members would criticise the Opposition motion, many useful points will be raised in the debate which I hope will inform, not only ourselves, but the police force and those who look on the police as their protectors.

I shall speak briefly on the three obvious issues. The first is the operational changes that police forces are being asked to undertake. The second is funding—I would not disagree with some of what the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) said about funding problems. The third issue is the welfare and payment conditions of serving police officers.

The debate comes at a useful time because I shall spend tomorrow night with the local police in my town of Stonehouse. I try to get out with them every three months or so; I believe that it is useful for all hon. Members to see how the police function. I whisper this very softly, but every time that I have been out with the local police they seem to have a quiet night, so I am regarded as a good-luck charm; other Friday nights are not so wonderful. I have yet to see that much action, but I hope to enrich my perspective.

Our police authorities have undergone enormous change since their somewhat controversial establishment. Their true impact is as yet unclear. Some of us would argue that policing still has a resonance within the local government framework, and that there have been dangers in isolating it from other service provision, but those police authorities are extant and we must face up to all the implications.

Many other changes have taken place, not least the one that I am constantly made aware of when I go out and listen to constituents. In the past 10 to 20 years, policing has changed. It is now much more about targeting resources and fighting crime directly, which is not necessarily commensurate with the high-visibility presence of police on the beat. That poses a dilemma. In a rural or semi-rural area, such as the one that I represent, constituents will not see so much of the police. I assure them that there is a lot of policing going on—there is plenty of action behind the scenes. However, they cannot have it both ways. The time that the police spend walking the beat cannot be spent chasing criminals—and most of us would presume that the latter is the most effective way for the police to use their time.

That links with the ministerial statement, made yesterday, I believe, that the Government were prepared to consider changing the location of police stations, different ways in which the police could be tasked to perform their duties and so on. I welcome that because, although there should be a debate on the subject and although we should be very much affected by what constituents tell us, we cannot believe that the police service is static. It must evolve and move with the times. Criminals are mobile, so we must make the police as mobile as possible.

The need for change has been acknowledged and acted on in my local police force, in Gloucestershire. A year ago, we restructured the police force into three new divisions, and beneath those are inspector areas, under the command and control of inspectors. The three in my area are Inspector Cheryl Thomas in Stonehouse—with whom I shall spend some time tomorrow night—Inspector Dave MacFarlane in Stroud and Inspector Mike Barton in Dursley. I have spoken to each in turn. Interestingly, they all welcome that additional responsibility, and the police on the ground thoroughly understand it.

The re-organisation has freed some people for specialist work in different teams. It is not without criticism—Chief Constable Tony Butler has had to go out and spell out to his force what he is doing and why he is doing it—but, in the main, it seems to have been welcomed and to work well.

Interestingly, we have just got rid of beats in Gloucestershire; we now have a system of parishing, which seems more sensible and which we can all understand. We were never sure what a beat was, who patrolled it and where they would be at any moment.

I shall now discuss the budgetary situation. In Gloucestershire we have an historical problem that pre-dates May 1997. Ours is a relatively small police force. The area is neither urban nor rural and, although it has a population of more than 500,000, that population is well spread, causing locational and funding difficulties.

Like the hon. Member for Basingstoke, I believe that we would have welcomed some re-jigging of the standard spending assessment. We would always argue in Gloucestershire that, because we never fit any of the criteria exactly, we do quite badly out of funding mechanisms. That is true, not only of policing, but of local government and of our health authority.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to keep that subject on the agenda. I urge him to ensure that the funding mechanism is as fair and transparent as possible. Might it be at all possible for him to find some more money for Gloucestershire? He knows that I have been in correspondence with him and he knows that we are about to meet—I hope sooner rather than later—to discuss some of the funding difficulties. We had a relatively low increase of 1.4 per cent., which is causing the police force some pain, especially as it is a small force. It is more difficult for a force of that size to accept the notion of 2 per cent. efficiency savings. Having suffered under the previous Government, the force has been asked to take even more difficult decisions on how to eke out the budget this time.

Therefore I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take back to the Home Office the message that the Gloucestershire police are trying very hard. They have introduced many of the changes that are needed, but the budget is not as good as it could and should be, and we may need to address that, if not this year, in future years.

Before I conclude I shall mention two points, one of which I raised with the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), and which I was surprised, if not staggered, that he did not mention—the pension overhang. It is a major problem. I have re-read the police pension review that was published last March. None of us can hide from its findings. The previous Government may have had a good reason for not undertaking such a review earlier, but we have published it and gone out to consultation. The pension issue cannot be avoided for much longer. In a couple of years, we in Gloucestershire will be spending more than 20 per cent. of our budget to keep up with pension payments.

In no way am I attacking the police or saying that we should not pay a good pension. However, the way in which we are currently funding pension payments, including the police provision from their own pocket, is not sustainable in the long run. We all know that. If we claim otherwise, we are fooling ourselves. I hope that my hon. Friend will tell us when policy decisions are to be taken following consultation, and how we will move matters forward.

One of the reasons why police pension payments are so high is that so many police leave the force early. That may be partly a result of attacks on the police. Also, the fact that policing is such a physical job means that they must be at peak fitness. We know about the difficulties, which must be taken into account in long-term plans to improve the welfare of the police. We must ensure that we provide adequate funding and organise policing in the most effective way.

In conclusion, I shall deal with some of the dilemmas confronting the police. It is a pity that the Liberal Democrat Benches are so empty today. It is good to see that the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) is present. I assume that his hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) is elsewhere, as today is the last day of the festival.

The race course in my area has decided to hold a three-day meeting over the millennium, which will require extra policing and the participation of all the emergency services. I have been told, and I am sure that I will be told again tomorrow night when I go out with the police, that the race course will be paying its bar staff about £70 an hour during the night of the millennium. It is quite within its rights to do so, but try to persuade the emergency services, including the police, that it is all well and good for them to work on their normal pay or perhaps a little extra over the same period. They will simply be fulfilling their normal responsibilities, although they will get time off in lieu.

I know that the festival will go ahead over the millennium and bring considerable revenue to Gloucestershire, but we need to think through our attitudes to the police. We take their work for granted. That is why it is so important that we get their pay, conditions and welfare right. We must deal with the pensions issue and ensure that our police operate as efficiently as possible. That can be achieved only if we give them the wherewithal to do their job as well as they can.

3.13 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): The police services in Britain are struggling, by their own account. The chief constables said that the latest settlement is well short of what is required. The Association of Chief Police Officers stated that even allowing for efficiency gains, the settlement is inadequate to meet current demands, still less new challenges.

[Mr. John Hayes]

I shall deal with five aspects of policing that all relate to the number of police in our police authorities. First, the increase in police numbers that took place during the 1980s and early 1990s has not been matched since. I take the Home Secretary's point that that process began in the early 1990s. It is interesting to note that if the figures are analysed closely, shire areas were disproportionately affected by that tailing off. I shall deal with the reasons for that later.

During the past two or three years, most police authorities have been hit by declining numbers. One of the problems is the relationship between crime rates and police numbers. We heard earlier of the assumption that if crime rates fall, a related fall in the number of policemen is justifiable. That is a fundamental error, reflecting a misunderstanding of the role and purpose of policing. It links policing to crime in too direct a way. The correlation is not so simple.

My second point relates to policing style. I shall not—nor, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would you allow me to—deal with the hyperbole and overreaction in the Macpherson report, although it might be appropriate to say that it is time that hon. Members stood up for our public servants against the ludicrous charge of institutionalised racism. I understand that we shall have the opportunity to do that in a future debate.

Police style is related to numbers. If we believe that the style of policing appropriate for the modern age mainly involves crime-solving, and that it is essentially reactive—like the ambulance service, perhaps—we denigrate the role of prevention, the importance of public morale, and the importance of police morale and complements. Policing should be about civil order and social service. The choice is between the fire brigade or ambulance service model, and the "Dixon of Dock Green" or "Heartbeat" type of policing.

We have heard that there was never any golden age in policing, but I reject the idea that the public do not want more bobbies on the beat—more friendly policemen whom they get to know, who are part of the community, who have particular responsibilities to a locality and who are seen in a positive light by the public. I am sure that is what people want. We must ensure that the policing style reflects that legitimate public demand.

Such a style of policing involves patrolling. In opening the debate, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) spoke of the importance of policemen being seen to patrol—bobbies on the beat, patrolling on foot and by car. Such non-adversarial policing is good for maintaining links between law enforcement officers and the public. The Minister will remember that one of the conclusions of the Scarman report was that there was a danger of the police becoming a remote elite, who were not just hostile to a particular part of society, but anti-people and distant. Part of non-adversarial policing—of the bobbies on the beat culture—is to forge a closer bond between public and police.

My third point entails crime and the fear of crime. All public surveys suggest that the fear of crime is profound. Dealing with that fear should be part of the policing agenda. That will not be accomplished by a style of policing largely based on crime reporting, crime detection and effective emergency reaction.

That brings me to my fourth point, which is about funding. In Lincolnshire, for example, we do not have enough crime or enough of the right type of crime to attract additional resource. [Laughter.] The fact that Labour Members laugh shows that they have not taken notice of what I said earlier. If policing is linked solely to the nature and level of crime, it ignores the role of the police as preventers of crime, the creators of social order and the custodians of a bond between people and the law.

That role is fundamental. If the police are seen as involved solely in clearing up serious crime, that removes aspects of their role such as visiting schools to forge links with young people. That role has largely disappeared in many constabularies because the police simply do not have the manpower for it. That approach, which, from their reaction, is clearly supported by some Labour Members who do not approve of such policing, has done much damage in divorcing the public from the police.

If the grant settlement is tied to a reactive style of policing—a crime-led style of policing—it inevitably reinforces that style of policing, because the police will have only sufficient funds to deal with emergencies. They will not have the latitude to develop innovative policies in non-adversarial policing.

Mr. Drew: Is not the hon. Gentleman missing the point that crime and disorder strategies and partnerships allow the police to work with other elements within their communities to ensure a full coverage of all the issues about which he speaks?

Mr. Hayes: The problem with crime and disorder strategies is that they may become solutions looking for problems. The crime and disorder strategy must be geared up to the preventive non-adversarial policing that I described, and resourced accordingly—I will deal with the standard spending assessment later.

The Minister of State nods, but there is little evidence to suggest that there is a satisfactory solution to the issue of the extra cost of policing rural communities. A research project is under way and I shall be looking for an assurance when the Minister replies that that will be published in the early part of this year so that we can study it. I hope that future settlements will take account of its findings.

At the moment, there is only patchy evidence of any serious commitment to considering the different policing needs of different parts of the country, and, worse still, how different parts of the country need to be funded in a way that is sensitive to their local needs. If policing is funded according to national criteria which are insensitive to particular demands—for example, those of sparsely populated areas—it will be inappropriate for such areas.

The staff in my chief constable's office made that very point to me this morning. To be honest, they did not complain about this year's settlement, although they were disappointed with the Government when the settlement was aggregated over two years. The Home Secretary said that that was because the Government had inherited the previous Government's spending plans—as though a Government coming into office with a massive majority and a mandate would not set their own agenda and say that, having looked at the situation closely, the figures would have to be changed; as though that would not have been part of a legitimate democratic decision.

What nonsense. In Lincolnshire, as in so many other shire counties, aggregated over two years the settlement is disappointing.

My fifth concern is that a problem also arises from the way in which the governance of police is likely to be changed by making police authorities best value authorities. The danger is that the targets that will be set by which the police will be judged are likely to reinforce the style of policing which I described earlier. The targets and measurables will be based on detection rates and measures of efficiency. It is hard to measure the intangible benefits from local community policing, such as school visits, in a way that can be related directly to crime and clear up rates, detection and efficiency. The problem with making police authorities best value authorities is that we shall set in stone targets and measurables—tangibles—which will reinforce an undesirable type of policing which is far removed from that which the public want.

The inclusion of police as best value authorities, inappropriately shoehorned into a structure that is essentially designed for local government, will reinforce many of the problems. It will also challenge the tripartite governance of the police, which is so valued by the police and the public. It will lead to a nationalisation of the police by setting uniform national targets by which the police will be judged, and by decreasing the role of local police authorities, possibly even impinging on chief constables' ability to make their own decisions on operational matters.

Some of those problems are long-term issues, and some are strategic issues, and it would not be fair to blame everything on the Government. [Interruption.] The Minister of State will know that I am renowned for my generosity and I do not want to tarnish that reputation today.

High expectations were raised when the Government took office, and they have no one but themselves to blame for that. Every interest group possible was told that the Government would deliver for them. That was certainly true with regard to police and law and order matters. The fact that there are fewer policemen on the beat in Spalding in my constituency now than there were five years ago is a cause of real concern to my constituents. They do not understand why the Government have not delivered on their pledges, have broken their promises and disappointed the people of Lincolnshire and elsewhere in Britain.

The Minister may legitimately say that some of these issues are strategic, but we will reply with equal legitimacy that the Government have made a slow start in addressing these strategic matters and have disappointed not only the people of Lincolnshire, but the people of Britain.

3.26 pm

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): I appreciate that one of the great strengths of the House is the diverse perspective that hon. Members bring to our discussions. But listening to some contributions this afternoon, I genuinely wonder whether Conservative Members have any idea what it is like living in an inner city, trying to cope with the explosion of crime that has taken place in recent years, and whether they have any understanding or appreciation of what my constituents face daily as they live with crime, burglary, robbery, violence and massively escalating theft.

It is right to set today's debate in a context. Conservative Members do not like to be reminded of uncomfortable figures; they prefer those that support their arguments. But we must examine the massive explosion in crime during the 18 years of Conservative Government. I shall confine my remarks to Greater Manchester, the area that I represent and know. In those 18 years, recorded crime rose by 130,000. That is a massive figure. Crimes against the person tripled in those years. Burglary increased two and a half times to a massive figure of 75,000 burglaries a year. Unbelievably, incidents of robbery increased 12 times, from 494 in 1979 to 6,296 in 1997. It may well be that resources have been put into the police, but the results of those resources have been pathetic. They did not deliver what the people wanted.

My constituents want crime to be reduced and burglars and robbers to be caught, convicted and sentenced. They also want the good, effective community policing. I say to the hon. Member for South Holland and—

Mr. Hayes rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Lady giving way, or just hesitating?

Ms Blears: I was simply hesitating because I could not remember the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

I say to the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) that my police force regularly goes into primary and secondary schools, investing a huge amount of time and resources in trying to ensure that young people can grow up with a sense of moral values, knowing the difference between right and wrong and trusting the police. We recognise that it is in working with young people that we shall begin to reduce the menace of crime that threatens those whom I represent. That is the context in which we should be talking about police numbers this afternoon. I am particularly worried about the increase in violent crimes—which threaten people's sense of safety and security—in many inner-city areas. Not only crimes that have been committed, but fear of crime limits people's willingness and ability to take part in normal community activities. Even the police now recognise that the links between unemployment, poverty, deprivation and crime are incontrovertible. Therefore we have to rebuild our communities if we are to tackle their long-term problems of crime.

The Opposition have a short and selective memory. They have concentrated on certain figures this afternoon, but I, for one, will never let them forget that their policies led to the massive explosion in crime, certainly in my city. Over 18 years of Tory Government there was excessive consumption for a few and a life of real hardship for the many.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Blears: No.

The Government have had to pick up the pieces after the community breakdown and disintegration that took place over those years, which is a huge task. Labour Members readily acknowledge that progress will not be achieved overnight and that our communities will not become safe and secure within a short time, but if we are to be successful we will have to be much more imaginative and creative about the way in which we run all our public services. That includes the police.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Blears: Time is short, so I do not intend to give way.

We need to examine the figures closely. The Audit Commission has said that there is no direct correlation between police numbers and the detection of recorded crime, but it has also said that there are significant variations in performance between police forces. The clear-up rate on burglaries in the best-performing metropolitan force is almost twice that of the worst. In particular, the Welsh police forces seem to do very well; they clear up 43 per cent. of burglaries, but only 11 per cent. of burglaries are cleared up in Greater Manchester.

To me, those figures say that questions need to be asked about how the police are working, how they are conducting their business, what they do in different areas and how we can learn from best practice. For example, why can Cumbria police detect 33 per cent. of recorded crime and Derbyshire police only 20 per cent? Those numbers are more complicated for the Opposition to deal with because they require thought and analysis, and they need to be worked through. Perhaps that is why the Opposition choose to rely on the crude numbers relating to simple police strength. The figures relating to performance raise difficult issues for us to tackle, but, if we are to achieve sustainable long-term improvements, we must be prepared to analyse them.

The Audit Commission report says that there is little direct correlation between the number of police officers employed, the work that they do and the targets that they achieve. The police have now recognised that they cannot simply tackle crime on their own and that they have to work in partnership with others. That would add value to the money that we spend on the police.

The police are not some separate force, but integral to our communities. They work with the housing, education and social services, business and voluntary sectors as well as with the community. Bringing that expenditure together and making sure that we get added value from it is that task that faces us.

Local people do not particularly want more crime to be detected, although that would help. They want crime to be reduced, or not to be committed in the first place. We must shift the emphasis of the conduct of policing from simply trying to detect crime once it has happened—because, by then, there is already a victim and communities are being destroyed—to addressing the start of the process, to make sure that we concentrate on reducing and preventing crime.

To achieve that objective the police must work with other partners, such as local councils, to design better street lighting and work on housing estates, and with the business community to set up closed circuit television systems, for example. In the development at Salford Quays, which is a prime industrial development, local businesses are helping to fund extra police services and the installation of closed circuit television. Those businesses recognise that it is in their best interests to make sure that the police force perform properly and competently.

The police also have to work with the public. I will welcome the anti-burglary initiatives that will be announced in the next few days. They will mean that many of my constituents will be physically safer in their own homes, but the overriding objective must be to strengthen our local communities. That means that the police must use ways of working that are very different from those that they used in the past.

If we want to make our towns and cities places in which people want to live, work and bring up their families, we have to make sure that people have pride in their areas. They also need the confidence and the strength to combat the criminals themselves, but that ability has been lost from many of our communities. People live in fear and are often unwilling to give evidence when they witness crime. They do not feel that they have a stake in the community and do not feel safe and confident enough to intervene.

I am pleased that imaginative, innovative and creative work is being done in many police forces up and down the country, and we should recognise and applaud that. Resources are being put into diverting young people from crime, not only through school visits, but through involvement in practical projects on the ground. I shall give two examples from my constituency. The Gears project is funded by the police, the probation service and the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, and those bodies bring together youngsters with a particular interest in motor bikes.

Those youngsters might have stolen motor bikes—[Interruption.] As a keen motor cyclist, I have a great interest in that. Those bodies bring young people together to build their own racing motor bikes. They are acquiring skills and receiving training in welding and engineering, which is diverting them into much more positive activity, and there is also an element of excitement for them.

If we are genuinely to divert young people from crime, we cannot simply invite them along to a youth club for a game of football, ping-pong or whatever. Young people want to be involved in exciting activities that give them a buzz and make life worth living, and our motor cycle project has been extremely successful in diverting young people from crime.

The second constituency example is a project run by my local rugby league team, Salford Reds. The club has an incredibly successful youth development programme and works with other organisations. The police are very supportive of the project and people visit primary schools—not only to get the youngsters playing rugby league, but to get them along to matches and involved in the club so that they feel that they have a stake in their city. That is so important in making sure that we build the self-confidence of those communities. Projects that divert our young people from crime are very important.

The police are working in new ways. We are putting an awful lot of resources into video surveillance. In areas with a lot of crime and disorder, parents often deny that their youngsters are responsible for causing trouble, but they react swiftly and effectively if they are confronted with video evidence of their children committing crimes and making other people's lives a misery.

Targeted policing means that our police meet every week to consider the causes of incidents and target their resources on the hotspots of crime. The police draw in officers from the housing department and the local authority and make sure that they consider the full spectrum of reasons for crime taking place in our community. They do not simply patrol the beat; they direct their activities to where maximum effect will be achieved and crime will be reduced.

In Salford we have a wonderful witness support scheme, which has been acknowledged in the Home Office document "Speaking up for Justice". It supports witnesses from the day that they witness a crime all the way through the process until they are able to give evidence in court. We must have more than a court-based scheme. We must say to people who are brave enough and strong enough to stand up and give evidence in difficult circumstances, "We are with you, we will support you, we will help you and we will take you through the whole process." I commend Salford's witness support scheme as an example of good practice.

All those are new ways of working. The police service should not remain static. The world is changing and the police service, and all our public services, have to change, too. We believe in public service, but we also believe in getting value for money from the investment that we make. Up and down the country, innovation is taking place and the old numbers game is over. It is not enough for Governments simply to allocate the resources, wash their hands, step back and not take any responsibility for results.

The huge variations in detection rates show us that some factors make some forces more successful than others. Those are difficult issues, but tackling them is the only way to achieve sustainable, long-term success. We are not about short-term thinking; this Government will be in office for a long time to come. The people in Salford whom I represent are delighted that, at long last, they have a Government who take their views seriously. The Government are getting involved in a partnership and in setting local priorities and targets. They will have the levers to drive up those standards. They have a Government who are listening, and I believe that it is because the Conservative Government did not listen and were out of touch that they are now out of office. Long may that remain so. I urge hon. Members to dismiss this motion.

3.40 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): It is disappointing that some colleagues were unable to speak in this debate, but doubtless they will find other ways of voicing their concerns about the state of the police service in their constituencies.

The Home Secretary failed to deal with the central point in the Opposition motion that police numbers are falling as a direct consequence of the policies of the Government. When he was not making personal attacks on my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), he seemed to be saying that the budget that the Government have allocated to the police is challenging but adequate. The Opposition say that the police funding settlement under Labour for the next three years is insufficient to maintain an effective police service. The direct consequence will be fewer police officers—not hundreds fewer, but potentially thousands fewer—which will undermine the fight against crime and the Government's law and order strategy.

Angela Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: No, I shall not give way.

From Essex to Cumbria, Bedfordshire to Gloucestershire and Lincolnshire to North Yorkshire, police numbers are going down, and we have heard much about that this afternoon. We believe that there is room for improvements in efficiency, but the Government insist on a 2 per cent. across the board efficiency gain in each of the next three years, and the effect of that will be inconsistent across the country. It penalises the very forces—many of them are the smaller, rural forces—that have already taken action to improve efficiency within their force. There was no better example of that than the one given by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) about Gloucestershire.

Sensible changes in the police estate will take years—not months—to implement. I refer particularly to yesterday's welcome report from the Audit Commission, "Action Stations". I am quite frankly astonished that the Home Secretary did not find time to refer to it in his 40-minute tirade.

Ministers have still not said how the 2 per cent. annual efficiency savings will be judged, but their impact cannot be in question: there will be fewer officers and a reduced service to the public just at a time—and this is central to our motion—when it is most essential to build the best possible relations between the police and the public.

The Home Secretary criticised the record of the previous Conservative Government. I shall briefly highlight four points. First, crime rates fell by 15 per cent. between 1994–95 and 1997–98: the source of the figures is the Audit Commission's 1997–98 report. Secondly, the number of constables increased in England and Wales by 2,322 between April 1992 and March 1997. The source for that is a written answer by the Secretary of State for Wales when he was a Minister in the Home Office. The average time that police constables spent in public increased by 4 per cent. between 1994–95 and 1996–97: again the source is the Audit Commission in its 1996–97 report. That report also stated:

"Most forces had increases in their funding in real terms between 1993/94 and 1996/97."

The Home Secretary seemed to forget what he said in his press statement a year ago announcing Labour's first police grant report settlement for 1998–99. He said:

"The police are the only local authority service to have had an increase greater than inflation in each of the last four years."

That is, four years in which the budgets were set by a Conservative Government. He has the audacity to come here today with a weak defence against the motion and to criticise that record.

Mr. Collins: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Greenway: If my hon. Friend will allow me, I shall not give way.

The Home Secretary clearly thought that such increases were a good thing. What has now persuaded him to change his mind, or did he not fight hard enough in the comprehensive spending review? Concerns about resources in the first Labour police settlement were brushed aside with the excuse that all the Government were doing was sticking to Tory spending plans. We heard the same point made again today, and we heard it on Tuesday when the Home Secretary had the audacity to use that as an excuse not to find money for closed circuit television cameras.

What do we find when the Government escape the shackles of budget constraints set by the mean old Tories and new Labour is free to do its own thing and put its money where its mouth is? The public and the nation should know what "tough on crime" really means under new Labour. What we got was a 1 per cent. cut in last year's settlement. We have got what the Police Superintendents Association has described as the worst spending round in a generation. The tragedy is that there are two more years of the same still to come. What a complete lack of political commitment to the police from a Government who seem intent on running down the police service! That lack of commitment risks a demoralised police force, from which the only gainers are the criminals. The losers will be our constituents: the general public.

The debate has shown that the demands we make on the police are greater than ever before. The police service throughout the country is overstretched. More and more police officers suffer from stress-related illnesses and violence through assaults. Our constituents want more visible policing. Much is made of zero tolerance—the in phrase is hotspot policing. Whatever name we choose, for the policy to be successful, it must be manpower intensive.

We need more officers, not fewer. They will have to implement the provisions of the new Crime and Disorder Act 1998, establish community partnerships, be responsible for policing millennium events, tackle vehicle crime, make our city centres safe late at night, build on the success of Operation Bumblebee to reduce burglary and Operation Eagle Eye to reduce street robberies, and respond every hour of every day to major road traffic accidents.

Those intractable problems cannot be solved by soundbites, by local authority or private patrols, or by a sudden conversion to CCTV cameras as a cheap way out—as we heard on Tuesday. Those initiatives should support the police, not be seen as a substitute for the police. Anyone who talks to police officers regularly will know that the police service wants to do an even better job and make our communities safer. Increasingly, the police feel betrayed by a lack of support from the Government.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield drew attention to what the Police Federation rightly said—that Treasury officials had swung the axe on police budgets. Like the Police Federation, several hon. Members have predicted fewer police officers, the closure of local stations and a reduction in front-line services in their areas, and those predictions are now coming true. That is not what the people of this country voted for in May 1997, and it will weigh heavily against new Labour when it chooses to face the country in two or three years' time.

What we heard from the Home Secretary was the same old display of complacency and commitment bordering on contempt. We ask no more than that the Government should match the Conservative commitment towards the police. They should match the pledge made by the Leader of the Opposition in Reading at the weekend to halt this decline in police numbers.

Hon. Members from both sides of the House must know that chief constables, police authorities, serving police officers and their constituents are deeply concerned about falling police numbers. This afternoon they can show how much they share that concern by supporting our motion.

3.49 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Paul Boateng): This morning, I went straight from the BBC studios—where I engaged in a debate with the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler)—to the streets of Peckham, where I joined two dedicated serving police officers on their patrol of a local estate. That was a necessary and salutary corrective, following my experience of debating the issue with the right hon. Gentleman. His rantings and ravings on police numbers—[Interruption.] Yes, that is what they are. The right hon. Gentleman's rantings and ravings bear no relation to what is actually happening.

While the right hon. Gentleman goes on and on about police numbers, police officers working on the ground with the public are responding to the challenge that they have been set by a Government who are determined to bring about the partnership between police and public that is the real answer to the problem of reducing and preventing crime. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 creates the necessary context—a context within which we are devoting new resources to tackling the challenges of policing as we move into the next millennium. To pretend otherwise is to live in a fantasy land—the sort of fantasy land in which the right hon. Gentleman dwells all too often for the purpose of making political points about police numbers, and which the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) sought to perpetuate.

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne): As my hon. Friend will know, we in Cornwall will have a particular policing problem in August, when there will be a total eclipse of the sun. Can he or our right hon. Friend the Home Secretary help in any way?

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. Friend has visited Cornwall to meet the chief constable, members of the police authority and members of the public. We shall respond in due course to the anxieties that my hon. Friend has expressed so eloquently in recent months.

Sir Norman Fowler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Boateng: No, not at this point.

The lesson from Devon and Cornwall is being repeated throughout the country. It suggests that police and community should come together to deliver safe and secure communities. To get hung up on the issue of police numbers, as the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield does, is to miss the point. This Government are applying an unprecedented level of resources to the task of policing our country.

The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) demonstrated real concern about Lincolnshire, and the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) was equally concerned about Hampshire; but when we compare what Conservative Members say with what has actually happened, we see a stark contrast between the two. Under a Labour Government, Lincolnshire's budget has been increased by 4.4 per cent. That is a larger increase than it had under the Tories at any time during the last three years of their Administration. The hon. Gentleman ought to be saying thank you, rather than pointing the finger of blame at the Government. The hon. Member for Basingstoke also whinged about resources, but, under this Labour Government, his local force received a 3.3 per cent. increase—above the national average—in its budget.

I visited Hampshire recently, and I commend the excellent work of the Hampshire police. In fact, the number of police increased by 38 in the six months between March and September 1998. That simply does not bear out the suggestion by Opposition Front Benchers that we are letting the police down. The reverse is the case.

Sir Norman Fowler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Boateng: No.

What we are doing is putting the emphasis on police efficiency and effectiveness, which is where it belongs. We are pursuing an agenda that has been endorsed by the Select Committee on Home Affairs, by the Audit Commission and by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. All those bodies recognise that to see the issue in terms of numbers alone is to miss the point.

The Tories really have lost the plot in regard to the policing of our country. We are determined to pursue this debate in ways that bring communities and police closer together, and recognise the importance of the targeting initiatives that we launched in Peckham this morning. We are devoting new resources—some £5 million out of a total of £250 million—to underpinning our crime reduction strategy, in addition to the £1.24 billion settlement.

The hon. Member for Ryedale was disparaging about closed circuit television, but it is cementing a partnership not just between police and public but, importantly, between the police and the private sector. That partnership is delivering in shopping malls and public spaces up and down the country: delivering, under a Labour Government, something that a Conservative Government consistently failed to deliver. Why are we delivering that? We are delivering it because we have learned the lessons of modern policing, which are about spreading good practice and building on the excellent work that the police are doing throughout the country.

Let me give an example. We have learned from auto crime, including thefts from vehicles, that it is not enough to be reactive: it is not enough to be in the business of spouting the simple rhetoric that we hear from Conservative Members. The police must be supported in their job of gathering criminal intelligence. It is necessary to support their proactive approach, which is about disrupting the market in the supply of stolen goods and which is intelligence led and problem orientated, and about backing that up with resources that deliver. Those resources must deliver in terms of promoting a sense of well-being and security among the public, and also in terms of meeting the demand that chief constables and the men and women on the ground properly make of their Government.

What is that demand? It cannot be seen simply in terms of numbers; it also provides a context for the sort of partnership that was described by my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Basildon (Angela Smith). We are talking about people working on the ground in order to cut the ground under the criminal: people working on the ground to ensure that local authorities, through the youth service, are working not against, but alongside the police and diverting young people from crime and offending. We are talking about those who do the business of policing. That is not about rhetoric—the sort of rhetoric that we hear from Conservative Members—but about delivering a reality based on partnership between the police and the public and, importantly, on the significant resources that this Government alone have managed to deliver to the police in recent times.

Those resources mean that we are able, together, to reduce crime. They mean that we are able to prevent crime. They enable us to proceed on the basis that together we can beat crime, and undermine criminal activity. That is what we intend to do. We intend not to engage in empty rhetoric about numbers, but to engage in the serious business of delivering a strategy on the ground that reduces and prevents crime. Nothing will stop us from doing that—working with the police and the public to promote a safe and secure society.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House pays tribute to the high standards of policing in this country; notes that the previous administration's promises in 1992 and 1995 of an additional 6,000 police officers were never carried through and that police numbers instead fell; welcomes the additional £1.24 billion for the police service and the extra £400 million for the crime reduction programme which are to be provided over the next three years; supports the police in their crucial role in tackling crime and creating safer communities; and recognises the need for the police, as with other public services, to continue to improve efficiency and effectiveness and deliver best value in the interests of the whole country.

Roads

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.12 pm

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): I beg to move,

That this House believes that the Government, having promised an integrated transport policy, are creating a standstill Britain and failing to deliver the immediate benefits promised before the general election; notes that 94 per cent. of passenger travel and 91 per cent. of goods moved within the UK is by road, so that a modern and efficient roads network is vital for UK prosperity and competitiveness; notes that the condition of UK roads is deteriorating; condemns the Government for cutting the programme of motorway and trunk road improvements to 37 schemes, which will increase the congestion and pollution which the Government say they oppose, despite raising the tax burden on the road user to £33 billion per year, of which less than one sixth is spent on transport; and calls upon the Government to stop hitting the road user with ever-higher taxes as a substitute for real policies to reduce congestion and pollution and to get Britain moving again.

The Labour party came to power pledging immediate benefits for the travelling public from its transport policies. Its manifesto promised "an effective and integrated transport policy at national, regional and local level that will provide genuine choice to meet people's transport needs."

Two years on, where are those benefits? There has certainly been plenty of spin. The Government have churned out more than 100 glossy publications and consultative documents on transport. Friends of the Earth has described the Government's style as "carry on consulting".

There has been no shortage of photo opportunities. The travelling public have been treated to images of the Deputy Prime Minister posing at a bus stop—unfortunately for him, with one of his two Jaguars just within camera shot waiting to pick him up. They have seen him strap-hanging on the London underground—for just one stop, I think—to prove his public transport credentials. Those credentials were subsequently rather damaged by the revelation that he took a Royal Air Force helicopter, at public expense, to switch on the Blackpool illuminations. This week in the tabloid press there have been some fetching pictures—I suppose that one has to call them glamour pictures, although, thankfully for us all, they were not on page 3—of the Deputy Prime Minister delivering a lecture from the jaws of the deep on the need for the rest of us to use the bus more. The Sun called it "scuba skiving".

There have been promises, promotional pamphlets, photographs and hot air—plenty of that—but no immediate benefits for the travelling public. The Government's transport policy has achieved increased fuel taxes, cuts in transport spending, a slashed roads programme and no reductions in congestion and pollution. It is small wonder that a recent BBC MORI poll showed that just 3 per cent. of people think that the Government are doing a good job on transport. People know that they are paying more and getting less.

[Mrs. Gillian Shephard]

The Government want the public to believe that they have not increased taxes. Despite the Prime Minister's denials in the House and elsewhere, figures from the House of Commons Library show that taxes are set to be £7.1 billion higher next year as a direct result of the Chancellor's first three Budgets. Increased taxation for the motorist is part of the Government's stealth tax attack. They are hostile to the motorist. They attack what they call car dependency as though it were an illness. They appear not to realise that, for many, the car is a necessity, not a luxury.

Petrol in Britain is now the most expensive in Europe. Of every £10 that the travelling public pay at the pumps, £8.50 goes straight to the Exchequer. As the Automobile Association has said, it is as though the Chancellor "is using motorists as a private piggy bank".

Adding together increased fuel tax, VAT and increased excise duty on all vehicles except sit-on lawnmowers, it became clear this week that not even the Mini has a small enough engine to qualify for the Chancellor's much trumpeted reduction in vehicle excise duty: road users will be paying to the Exchequer around £33 billion this year. The Government will be taking £9 billion more from road users in extra fuel tax during this Parliament than would have been the case if our policies had remained in place.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Does my right hon. Friend anticipate, as I do, that the Minister of Transport will say that the escalator was of the Conservative party's invention? To pre-empt the jeering Labour mob, will she confirm that this Government increased the escalator by a full 20 per cent. in the Budget?

Mrs. Shephard: We introduced the fuel escalator when fuel was cheaper in the United Kingdom than in Europe and we needed to meet our CO_2 targets. This Government have increased the fuel escalator. We oppose that increase. As we did with whisky duty, the Government should review the global effect of their policies on road travellers and reduce that tax burden.

The Minister of Transport (Dr. John Reid): To set the record straight, will the hon. Lady confirm that the last five increases under the Conservative Government in the taxes about which she is talking were 10 per cent, 10 per cent., 13 per cent., 10 per cent. and 7 per cent?

Mrs. Shephard: No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will confirm later that he has imposed an extra £9 billion on the motorist during this Parliament, together with cuts in public transport and the roads programme.

The people worst affected by the Government's policies, as the AA regularly points out, will not be those with two Jaguars, but people for whom a car is a necessity. It is a secure, convenient means of transport for women, the elderly and families, as well as for those who live in the countryside, where 85 per cent. of households have and need a car.

Mrs. Christine Butler (Castle Point): May I advise the right hon. Lady that one of the Jaguars of the Deputy Prime Minister is a bicycle?

Mrs. Shephard: That is the best definition of Jaguar that I have heard for some time. I look forward to the next photo opportunity and seeing the Deputy Prime Minister on a bicycle disguised as a Jaguar.

This will not be the end of the Government's taxation on motorists. They are preparing three more taxes; congestion charging, motorway tolls and a tax on workplace parking. It is no good the Government promising that the income will be hypothecated to invest in transport improvements, because they also promised, before the election, that there would be no tax increases under the Labour Government. I am afraid that no one will believe them.

The Government are saving their worst example of highway robbery for business. Company car tax is to be increased—but at least the Chancellor announced that in his Budget. Curiously, he failed to announce that he was increasing the price of diesel by more than 11 per cent.—or more than 6p a litre. He played down the fact that he was setting the price of a tax disc for large trucks at a rate 11 times higher than the average in Europe.

The day after the Budget, the Road Haulage Association set up a telephone helpline to advise haulage companies planning to register abroad. There were 700 calls on the first day. However, moving abroad is perhaps what the Government want. In a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on 23 February, the Minister said that all hauliers who operate internationally "can take advantage of lower prices elsewhere."

At least we know.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Did not the price of DERV increase by 60 per cent. between 1990 and 1997? Why did the considerations that apply in 1999 not apply between 1990 and 1997?

Mrs. Shephard: If the hon. Gentleman does his sums, he will realise that he is talking about a period of seven years, and he is talking about price increases.

Many smaller haulage companies cannot afford to move abroad, and many do not operate internationally. They will go out of business. This week, The Times, on the basis of a letter sent by a number of business organisations, estimated that transport tax could cost 50,000 haulage and associated jobs in three years.

The Minister of Transport is a sensible man.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Hon. Members: Oh!

Mrs. Shephard: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to correct me?

Mr. Davies: I wish to refer to the point made before the right hon. Lady's last, excellent point. May I draw to her attention the fact that the overall costs of running a typical firm of 50 38-tonne trucks—when corporation tax and labour costs are taken into account—are higher elsewhere? In the Netherlands, costs are 50 per cent. higher; in Belgium, 68 per cent.: and, in France, 35 per cent. The assumptions of that ridiculous article have not been made public, because it costs more to run companies in continental Europe.

Mrs. Shephard: I would not advise the hon. Gentleman to tell that to the average British trucker.

He might regret it. The Minister of Transport—normally a sensible man—told the Freight Transport Association a month ago that British hauliers were not suffering any serious disadvantage. I would like to read to him a letter faxed to me today by Mr. David Burton who runs a small transport company in Whissonsett, in Norfolk. He said:

"I am contacting you for help and to lobby this Government regarding the terrible plight of UK hauliers. As you are aware we cannot compete with unfair competition from continental hauliers due to this Government's insistence of the fuel duty escalator. I and my wife have built up from nothing to a profitable company employing 17 employees from a small rural village in mid Norfolk over the last 20 years. This is now very much in jeopardy due to vast differences in fuel duty. We have in the last month lost an valuable contract running to Spain due to unfair competition and also another contract to Holland and Germany is under scrutiny by our customer, asking for a reduction in rates which will be the final straw. We are desperate for help and cannot survive much longer."

I appeal to the Minister to listen to Mr. Burton—an authentic voice from the smaller end of the business—to reduce the tax burden and to play his part in saving 50,000 jobs.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell): The right hon. Lady's concern for that haulier and the lorry industry—and for motorists in general—is clear. Will she make it clear whether the policy of her party is now to end the fuel escalator, and whether the shadow Chancellor has agreed that with her?

Mrs. Shephard: I have said that we think the Government should do as we did with whisky duty and review the global effects of their policy on the haulage industry and reduce the tax burden. That is what they should do—they are in charge.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): The right hon. Lady is developing policy on the hoof. Is she proposing that we freeze duty on diesel, or cut the duty?

Mrs. Shephard: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman was not listening—I suppose that he was bemused by the glamour pics. What I said earlier was what I just said to the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor). I could hardly put the position more clearly. He may recall that we voted against the increase in the Budget.

The Government have increased road taxes, affecting every man, woman and child in the country. That is despite their promise that there would be no tax increases under Labour. The travelling public—the people who were promised immediate benefits under Labour—are entitled to ask why. Clearly, despite the Government's desire to hide behind a green smokescreen, this is not being done for environmental reasons.

The stark fact is that, following the Budget, the Government's tax take from road users will increase this year by £1.6 billion. Spending on transport is to be cut for each of the next three years, as the Department's own figures confirm. Thus, there will be no investment in public transport to provide a choice for motorists, as promised in "Consensus for Change."

The then Labour transport spokesman, now Secretary of State for International Development, said that her intention was that people should be "caught in traffic jams when driving to work to see clean fast buses whizzing by and determined to leave their cars at home."

She was right on one count. We have the jams—but where are the buses?

As John Dawson of the AA said,

"The Chancellor's environmental excuse for hitting motorists is wearing very thin."

He said that the Budget is

"a purely revenue generating measure which impacts most on less well off families and those living in rural areas without any realistic public transport alternatives. No country in Europe spends so little of what it takes from motorists on its transport system."

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): Does the change in policy that the right hon. Lady is making on the fuel escalator—which, I understood, was introduced by the Conservative Government for environmental reasons—mean that she is abandoning a commitment to achieve the environmental objectives, or does she have alternatives to suggest? Many of us who represent rural areas understand the concerns that she is raising. The county that we both represent has more to lose—literally—in land mass by global warming than most.

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman makes his point, whatever it may be. I have made it absolutely clear why we voted against the Government's punitive increase in diesel duty. I remind him that he, too, has many hauliers in his constituency.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Surely the Government are misunderstanding the point. It is not that lorries will cover fewer miles, but that companies will flag out to other European countries. They will carry on transporting, but far more cheaply than is possible in this country.

Mrs. Shephard: From what we understand from the Minister, the Government's policy is to attract foreign companies here to add to our pollution and congestion. The Government cannot claim that the extra tax that they have raised is used to reduce congestion and bottlenecks. Last July's roads review slashed the roads programme from more than 140 targeted improvements to only 37, and it will be up to a decade before many of those are completed.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): May I take it that the Conservative party no longer supports the international agreement to curb carbon dioxide emissions? If so, what measures would the right hon. Lady put in place that would have the same effect as our taxation measures?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Lady should listen to the case that I am making. The Government are imposing swingeing tax increases on road users. They have made cuts in overall transport spending, depriving road users of public transport alternatives. They slashed the roads programme, which would have reduced congestion and pollution.

The local transport settlement amounted to a real-terms decrease in cash for local authority road schemes, and that is set to continue for the next three years. The December survey by the Institution of Civil Engineers found that the maintenance backlog had increased by 40 per cent. since 1996 and now stands at a total of £160 for every vehicle licence holder.

[Mrs. Shephard]

The Opposition support an integrated approach to transport. We agree that we must make the best use of what we have, in the way that is most sustainable for the environment. We support the responsible use of the car and responsible roads investment to reduce congestion and pollution. When in office, we invested £26 billion in roads and nearly the same amount in public transport. Our policies levered in more private funds to increase public transport choices.

The Government have broken their pre-election promises on transport. There have been no immediate benefits for the travelling public. Their answer to transport problems is to tax the motorist off the road and to put hauliers out of business. Their swingeing stealth tax increases are hitting every man, woman, child and business in the country. They are cutting investment in public transport and our roads. They are creating a standstill Britain. I urge the House to support the motion.

The Minister of Transport (Dr. John Reid): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"commends the Government for taking a far-sighted and more integrated approach to roads policy than the previous administration; notes that the previous Government's 'predict and provide' approach to road building has been discredited and that the present Government has instead taken a realistic and practical approach based on the five criteria of integration, the economy, the environment, safety and accessibility; notes further that the previous Conservative Government's grandiose but impractical wish-list of schemes for which funding was not available has been replaced by a targeted programme of improvements, all of which can be started within seven years; welcomes its increased and more rationally-based spending on roads maintenance; and applauds the Government for tackling the problems of congestion and pollution, thereby ensuring that the road transport system operates for the benefit of individual people and the UK economy as a whole."

I strongly deprecate these attacks on my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. He is a sensitive soul and will no doubt have been deeply offended by the remarks of the right hon. Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard). If she chooses in future to start a debate with an attack on my right hon. Friend for his obsession, as she put it, with media opportunities, she should advise her colleague, the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), not to send letters round to all Conservative Members saying:

"Central office will be using the debate to mount a major media operation."

That may be the pot calling the kettle black.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) rose—

Dr. Reid: I have not actually said anything yet, but I will give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Lansley: I thought that it might be unwise to wait until the right hon. Gentleman had said something. As he purports to understand the road haulage industry, can he tell me how much it costs to fill a 1,000 litre tank with diesel in the United Kingdom and in Belgium?

Dr. Reid: I cannot give the exact cost, but I have looked into the matter and I can use the same example used by the hon. Member for North Essex in the weekend newspapers, and give the costs for 50 trucks of 38 tonnes each, assuming that they are flagged out and paying all the relevant costs in the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and the Netherlands respectively. We are entitled to make that comparison. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman asked me a question on a subject in which he purports to be interested, so he should listen to the reply.

For a fleet of 50 38-tonne trucks, if we include the social costs, national insurance, taxation, corporation tax, employees' costs, fuel and vehicle excise duty, the additional cost in France, as compared with the United Kingdom, is about £425,000 a year; in the Netherlands, about £600,000; and in Belgium, about £800,000.

I take the competitiveness of the road haulage industry extremely seriously—I shall meet representatives of the industry next Tuesday and will be pleased to listen to them and to discuss the industry's future—I understand that it is a fiercely competitive world and that there is overcapacity in the United Kingdom; but let us not exaggerate to the extent of blaming all the problems with competitiveness on the fuel escalator or on VED. We need a balance if we are to do justice to the industry.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) rose—

Dr. Reid: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would allow me to read the first sentence of my speech. I intend to start at the beginning, which is always a good place to start.

I listened with attention and admiration to the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk. I listened with attention for any mention whatever of the previous Government, whose legacy was our starting point, and with admiration because of her sheer oral dexterity in managing to speak for 25 minutes without mentioning that Government. There was no hint of self-criticism, no shred of remorse and not even a suspicion of guilt.

Let me remind the House of the starting point of the Labour Government's challenge on roads and transport. We inherited an awful legacy from the previous Government. We inherited road traffic set to grow by more than 33 per cent. over the next 20 years, and congestion, costed by the Confederation of British Industry at £20 billion per annum to business, set to double over the next 20 years. We inherited roads that kill or seriously injure more than 45,000 people a year. We inherited roads that add substantially to local air pollution, hastening the deaths of thousands of vulnerable people each year. Perhaps above all, we inherited no choice in public transport—a system in which all non-road transport had been allowed to decline for two decades. Those two decades saw reduced bus usage, reduced rail freight, reduced rail patronage and, above all, a road infrastructure that by every statistic issued even by the then Conservative Government was in the worst state of repair of any roads since records began.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): My right hon. Friend mentioned the legacy of 18 years of Conservative Government. In my constituency, we have the legacy of a quarter of a century of Tory rule in Lancaster and the interminable Tory years in Wyre. Is my right hon. Friend aware of the problems caused by the scandalous condition of the moss roads network which blights the entire rural community in the Wyre district?

Is he aware of the appalling condition of bridges throughout Lancashire and of the desperate need for the Heysham-M6 link, which the previous Tory Member of Parliament resisted for so many years?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend makes his point well, and we and the wider nation are now aware of it. What was the Tories' policy to tackle the problems? Was it a plan for the future? Was it the development of public transport services? Was it the provision of choice? No. It was to produce every year an ever-lengthening wish list of roads—roads that were never funded, timetabled or finished, because they were never started. I shall remind the House of that cruel deceit that was perpetrated annually on the people of this country by the previous Conservative Government.

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): If the right hon. Gentleman really believes that—it is a travesty of what happened, and I hope if I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to make that clear—why has he slashed the roads programme, substantially reduced expenditure and cut the transport programme generally?

Dr. Reid: I shall give the right hon. Gentleman an example—the House may find this illuminating—of the fantasy league of roads that was produced every year by the Conservative Government. In 1990, which was around the time that the right hon. Gentleman was Secretary of State for Transport, the Conservatives' wish list had 500 roads on it. They boasted proudly that it was costed at £30 billion, but it was funded only up to £1.26 billion. That was a deceit, because it was a pretence that—

Several hon. Members rose—

Dr. Reid: Conservative Members are very keen and I can see some of the young bulls getting up. They will get their chance in the ring in a moment. The Conservative Government pretended that they could build £30 billion worth of roads with £1.26 billion of funding.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): Why cut it then?

Dr. Reid: It was the Conservative Government, as a gesture towards the real world, who cut the list between 1990 and 1995 from 500 roads to 250 and, finally, two years ago, to 150. They were the only Government in history to cut paper roads faster than they were building actual roads.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way to a 50-year-old bull. I feel as if he is waving a red rag at me, because my constituents do not recognise the description of the previous Government's so-called wish list. Can he explain to me why a road that was a third built under the previous Government has had its eastern and western sections cancelled by this Government? That was not a mirage of a road, because a third of it is there. Can we please have the other two sections?

Dr. Reid: Because of the delicate way in which the hon. Gentleman put his point, I shall look at it and see what can be done. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] I said that I shall look at it. The reality is that we have changed the policy and the programme because we are not prepared to deceive people.

The policy that we inherited was one of increasing congestion, with its associated costs and inconvenience, increasing pollution with its increasing damage to health, and increasing intellectual paralysis, as the Tory Government stood like rabbits transfixed in the headlights of a million oncoming juggernauts. I cannot pretend that we will turn that mess around overnight. The transport system is like a supertanker and it cannot do a pirouette. I realise that our transportation system is inadequate: it could not be otherwise because it is still largely the product of the legacy that were left. Inevitably, we have to deal with that. Although change will take time, we have already started with some success.

If congestion on our roads is to be tackled, we need to increase the amount of freight carried by rail. Under this Government, for the first time in more than quarter of a century, we have increased rail freight by 12 per cent. For the first time for more than 25 years, we now have more rail freight year on year—12 per cent. more last year and 16 per cent. more so far this year.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) rose—

Dr. Reid: I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman. As the originator and developer of congestion charging, he is entitled to come to the Dispatch Box.

Sir George Young: For sheer effrontery, it would be difficult to match what the right hon. Gentleman has just said. The increase in freight by rail was secured by privatising the rail system, a policy that the Labour party did all it could to obstruct.

Dr. Reid: For the first time in 25 years, in the first year of this Government, rail freight increased. Part of that, last year and this, was no doubt the result of privatisation. Part of it was because of the political backing and the money put into infrastructure grants for rail freight as a direct policy of this Government to reduce congestion on roads.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): How much?

Dr. Reid: A 16 per cent. increase in the first six months of this year—

Mr. Burns: Of what?

Dr. Reid: In tonnes per kilometre of freight carried on the railways. I shall send the hon. Gentleman a note and an abacus to make it easier for him.

If the waste and inconvenience of traffic jams are to be reduced, we must offer people a choice.

Mr. Jenkin rose—

Dr. Reid: I will give way if the hon. Gentleman will allow me to finish a paragraph. I may get through one yet.

If the waste and inconvenience of traffic jams are to be reduced, we must offer people a choice, a real alternative to using the car. Over the past three years there has been a choice. Use of railways has increased—as the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) said, there has been a 25 per cent. increase in passengers—and there has been a reversal of the decline in bus passenger numbers in many areas. If crowded inner-city roads are to be improved, we must encourage the use of buses, and, for the first time in decades, the Government have begun to halt that decline and to turn it around.

We are making progress, and, unlike the previous Government, we have provided resources commensurate with the task of encouraging and developing public and private sector public transport systems. We have increased funding for capital maintenance of trunk roads by 50 per cent., from £200 million to £300 million, and we will end the decline of the condition of the trunk road network.

We will increase funding for making better use of that network by 60 per cent. by 2001–02. We have established a £50 million safety budget for small trunk road safety schemes, and a new programme of targeted improvements. We are committed to start a realistic programme of 37 schemes costing £1.4 billion within seven years, and we set out the relevant dates last December.

Mr. MacGregor indicated dissent.

Dr. Reid: The right hon. Gentleman may laugh, but when he was Secretary of State, he presided over 500 schemes that had starting dates ranging from any time between now and the millennium after next.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dr. Reid: I must give way to the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor).

Mr. MacGregor: The Minister must know that the £1.4 billion is to be spent over seven years. We spent almost that amount on new road schemes in a single year.

Dr. Reid: The right hon. Gentleman was not spending the same amount every year as we are spending over seven years. It is true that we have, for two reasons, diverted our emphasis from building new roads to road maintenance. First, we discovered—as did the previous Government—that we cannot work on a predict-and-provide basis, and that we cannot build our way out of congestion. Secondly, the dreadful state of the roads means that we will pay more in the long term by failing to maintain our roads in the short term than we would if we spent a decent amount of money on them. We have reallocated resources, and we make no apology for that.

Unlike the previous Government, we have made sure that every target road is funded and that we are capable of delivering it. We have been especially keen to construct bypasses. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where?"] My first statement as Minister of Transport was made two and a half days after I was appointed, and I was delighted to announce a programme that included 19 bypasses—almost four times as many in a single statement as the previous Government declared during their final four years in office. My statement included three bypasses shelved by the previous Government that I had reinstated. I think that every hon. Member would agree that bypasses are beneficial.

Dr. George Turner: I hope that I do not impose on the mood of generosity that my right hon. Friend has been displaying, but he will know that my constituents were promised a flyover at the Hardwick roundabout near King's Lynn. The promise was repeated for 14 years, but the flyover was never delivered. I respect the Government's honesty, and, although the pie-in-the-sky flyover is not to appear yet, my constituents will welcome the fact that the Government have said that there will be a flyover. May I tell my constituents that there will be a start on the project during this Parliament?

Dr. Reid: Before every hon. Member intervenes with a local bypass suggestion, let me remind my hon. Friend of what I have said before: if hon. Members have a specific case to raise, would they write to me about it? My hon. Friend can certainly commend to his constituents the honesty of the Government.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dr. Reid: I will give way to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), but it must be the last intervention. I must make some progress.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Naturally, we welcome the bypasses that he is building, but nine bypasses over seven years pale into insignificance against the 160 plus that we built during our 18 years in office. The Government are failing to live up to the expectations that they generated when they stood for office two years ago.

Dr. Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comment. However, we are building 19 bypasses, not nine. Those 19 were announced in a single statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey) rose—

Dr. Reid: I have to make some progress.

Mr. Gray: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister has been on his feet for 20 minutes to speak on a motion about the Government's road policies without yet having mentioned the Government's road policies. Is not that a disgraceful waste of Back-Bench Members' time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has taken a large number of interventions, which do not help him to make progress on his speech. Points of order of that sort only slow down the whole process.

Dr. Reid: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker; that has ensured that I take no more interventions.

Unlike the previous Government, we have a coherent strategy, and it was set out in our White Paper in July last year. We are establishing integrated local transport strategies as well as national ones. We base our approach on partnership. There will be partnership with local authorities, to whom we are prepared to hand over decision making on 40 per cent. of trunk roads and we shall ensure that they have the resources to back those decisions. There will be partnership with the private sector; we have already announced three design, build, finance and operate trunk road projects. That brings us to the meat of the subject, about which the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) asked. Those projects are for the A13 in east London, the A1 in Yorkshire and the A2-M2 in Kent; they are designed to harness the energies of both the public and private sectors.

As further evidence of that partnership, I am pleased to announce today the go-ahead for a private initiative project to fund the construction of the A130 bypass in Essex. The Government will provide £92 million to Essex county council to help fund construction on the A130. The poor reliability of the existing road has made it difficult for south-east Essex to attract business, investment and jobs. The scheme demonstrates that central and local government can work together effectively. It is integration in action: improving transport, aiding local regeneration, improving safety and creating jobs.

Apart from the differences that I have outlined, I hope that there are points on which the Government and the Opposition can agree. Streetworks are among the largest blights on Britain's roads. People are sick and tired of the disruption and inconvenience of prolonged streetworks. We intend to act on that and have made it plain that we shall authorise local authorities to penalise utilities or contractors for work that is overdue. We therefore entirely support the thrust of the private Member's Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser). We want to hold consultations on the mechanics of any such legislation to ensure that we have the best and most effective mechanism to minimise the disruption caused by streetworks.

The terms of the hon. Gentleman's Bill would pre-empt that desire. However, I am glad to tell the House that the hon. Gentleman and I have held fruitful discussions and he has assured me that he is willing to co-operate in taking account of those points and I am hopeful that we can find a way forward. In any event, we want to act as speedily and effectively as possible to reduce the disruption and inconvenience of prolonged streetworks.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Reid: In view of my direct reference to the hon. Gentleman's Bill, the House would expect me to give way to him.

Mr. Fraser: I am most grateful to the Minister for his comments on my Bill. I hope that it will be one step in a positive direction for Government support on a matter that currently has all-party support; we shall continue to work on that matter.

Dr. Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that note of all-party consensus, because in other areas the Government are prepared to take the hard choices that the Opposition are no longer willing to face. We have provided a new mechanism for reducing congestion, while providing a new income stream for transport initiatives. Congestion charging will provide local authorities with powerful new tools to tackle congestion, both through the charges themselves and through the additional transport investment that the income from the charges will allow them to fund. The right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk attacked congestion charging in her speech. I have to tell her that I cannot claim all the credit for that idea. Credit where credit is due: the concept was invented and developed by the Conservatives, by no less a person than the right hon. Member for North West Hampshire. The 1995 Green Paper stated that the Conservative Government held on congestion charging. I am not so churlish as to deny the Conservatives the credit that is due to them, but am rather taken aback by their apparent modesty in claiming their birthright on congestion charges.

I was even more surprised to read the robust comments of the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway). In debate on the Greater London Authority Bill he said that the Conservative party did not rule out the possibility, at some time in the future, subject to consultation, of having a look at congestion charging. It is not as if Opposition Members know where they stand on that issue. I am reminded of the words of Churchill about Baldwin's Administration:

"They have decided to be undecided, resolved to be irresolute, adamant for drift, solid for fluidity and all powerful to be impotent."

That just about sums up the Opposition's approach to some of the issues that they have raised today.

The right hon. Lady referred also to the haulage industry, and particularly to vehicle excise duty and fuel. I assure the House that we recognise the impact that taxation can have on competitiveness and profitability. That is why we must strike a balance between legitimate environmental concerns and the transport needs of the industry. I shall listen carefully to what the Road Haulage Association representatives have to say when I meet them next Tuesday. However, we firmly believe that we can best help the industry—and particularly hauliers—by creating a climate of sustainable economic growth and long-term investment.

Let us examine some of the Budget measures. We have reduced main corporation tax to 30 per cent. and small companies corporation tax to 20 per cent. Moreover, from 1 April 2000, companies with profits of up to £10,000 will pay corporation tax of only 10 per cent. Companies with profits of up to £50,000 will benefit from relief given to ease the transition from the new starting rate to the 20 per cent. rate. Employees of haulage businesses will benefit from the new 10p starting rate of income tax from this April and employers will benefit from reduced national insurance contribution levels from 2001.

Those are only the general initiatives; the Budget also contained specific measures for hauliers. We have frozen road duty levels for 98 per cent. of all lorries—I thought that the Opposition would applaud that move. The reduction in VED for cleaner lorries has doubled from £500 to £1,000. The duty rates on ultra-low sulphur diesel have been reduced relative to ordinary diesel and the duty rates on road fuel gases have been cut by no less than 29 per cent.—one of the biggest ever cuts in duty.

The Opposition's suggestion that the Budget does nothing for haulage firms is a grotesque misrepresentation of the facts. It is all about balance. Vehicles with an 11.5-tonne drive axle weight—to which the Opposition like to refer—cause significant road damage. That is why their road duty rates were set as they were, although we froze 98 per cent. of other rates.

The Opposition are also suffering from amnesia about the fuel duty escalator. I remind the House that the previous Government introduced the fuel duty escalator in 1993 and committed themselves to maintaining it until 2000. The right hon. Lady accused us of placing a burden on industry of 6 per cent. a year. She seems to have forgotten that 5 per cent. was imposed by the Conservatives and only 1 per cent. by Labour. We made that imposition in recognition of our need to act if we are to continue to lead the world on climate change.

As for the firms that are moving abroad to avoid the so-called excessive burdens, I gave the comparative figures for the whole cost earlier in the debate. I admit that it is a complex matter: I do not suggest for a minute that it is not possible to engineer a formula that would achieve savings. I want to talk to the industry about that and other matters. However, international haulage firms with 50 38-tonne lorries based in the Netherlands and Belgium—the countries with which we are invited to make a comparison—will face costs additional to the levels that I outlined earlier.

In view of the Conservatives' declared opposition to the fuel duty escalator and VED rates, I have done their Front-Bench spokesmen the courtesy of spending time reading through the speeches that Conservative Members made in government, so that I can consider their criticisms and how publicly they voiced them. Since Norman Lamont introduced the fuel duty escalator, there have been eight Budget debates and a huge number of transport debates. Not once during those years did tonight's Opposition spokespersons express a scintilla of criticism.

In the Budget debate of March 1993—the Budget that introduced the fuel duty escalator—the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk hailed the Chancellor's statement as a Budget for business. She not only acquiesced in that Budget, but lauded it

Mr. Jenkin: What was the price then?

Dr. Reid: I am coming to the hon. Gentleman. In the debate on the Budget of November 1993, the hon. Member for North Essex, who will wind up for the Opposition tonight, waxed lyrical about the Chancellor's weight and stature, the heaviness of his task and, above all, his courage and the toughness of his decisions. In that Budget, which was lauded by the hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor increased the fuel duty escalator by 66 per cent.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should now recall the words of that Chancellor, who during that Budget statement, which both he and the right hon. Lady lauded, declared:

"Any critic of the Government's tax plans who claims also to support the international agreement to curb carbon dioxide emissions will be sailing dangerously near to hypocrisy."—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 939.]

All we can say to the Conservatives tonight is, "Hello sailor."

On roads, as on transport in general, we have set out an agenda for a generation, a radical platform for action and a programme for progress, with which I am sure the vast majority of hon. Members are pleased and proud to be associated.

5.8 pm

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): I begin by declaring an interest in that I am a non-executive director of a company that has a transport subsidiary. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Well, at least that gives me an insight into the effect of the Chancellor's measures. I want to speak primarily as a former Secretary of State for Transport who had a substantial roads and road-building programme and as a Member of Parliament for a rural area who sees the damage that the Government's policies are doing. I shall focus on the roads programme.

The Minister of Transport does a good cabaret turn and has a sardonic wit, which was demonstrated in his opening remarks comparing his Government's performance with that of our Government. He could scarcely conceal the smile on his face as he quoted the figures, and I shall, I hope, demolish his case.

I am glad that we are having this debate because I have frequently spoken in the House, both as Secretary of State for Transport and, since I left office, as a Back Bencher, in favour of a major roads programme. I want to develop my case because the Government's actions are extremely dangerous for the country's future transport infrastructure.

I shall first set out the background that existed when I was Secretary of State for Transport and with which the right hon. Gentleman must now deal. As he knows, about 90 per cent. of all road traffic, both passenger and freight, consists of cars. I am all in favour of—and was myself determined to introduce—measures to change that balance, particularly for freight. I find it rather ironic that he is now claiming the credit for the current increase in rail freight, which is entirely due to the policies that I introduced in the Bill to privatise the railways, which his party completely opposed. I knew that the focus on the customer and the drive that the private sector produces would be the only way in which to achieve a switch of freight from road to rail. I am delighted that that strategy is working and that our policy achieved it.

I am in favour of as much switch as possible, but we must face the fact that, however much switch one achieves and however much one improves public transport, there will still be a substantial year-by-year growth in the use of roads by cars and lorries. We all know that many people must make essential journeys by car, especially in rural areas. Also, it is most people's aspiration to be more mobile. What is the first thing that young people want when they leave school and start to earn? About 80 per cent. want to own a car and to use it. We must face that fact as we develop transport policy.

There are two other background points. It has often occurred to me that one of the reasons why the climate is sometimes against road building and the car is that so many officials in Departments and national media commentators live and work in London. In London, the issues are entirely different because it has a good public transport network. In London, when we were in government, we spent much more on public transport than on roads. It was a different matter in rural areas, but I used to find it extraordinarily difficult to get the argument going about the needs of rural areas.

All Members of Parliament who represent rural areas know that public transport cannot replicate all the journeys that people want to make in rural areas. Therefore, a heavy emphasis must be placed on road investment in not just rural areas but many market towns and others outside the metropolis. I have often felt that the national debate just does not mirror the real needs of people in rural areas. Any Secretary of State for Transport who travels around the country knows that the greatest representations are made on improvements to the road programme, such as bypasses, and so on. A Secretary of State for Transport ignores such representations at his peril.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): As a former Minister, does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the conclusion of the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment, which reported to his Government, that new road infrastructure generates journeys that otherwise would not be made?

Mr. MacGregor: That intervention was absolutely splendid, because it raised just the point that I was about to address. The Tories were not building any new roads. I stopped the last proposed new road—the additional proposal on the east coast as an alternative to the A1—because I did not think that it was necessary or desirable. It would have created what the hon. Gentleman suggested. There is a big distinction between building entirely new roads and substantial road schemes to widen and improve—not just maintain—the motorway and trunk road network, and bypasses.

Dr. George Turner: The right hon. Gentleman and I come from Norfolk, and he will know that the dualling of the A11 is still not complete after 30 years of waiting. Similarly, improvements to the A47 have been awaited throughout that period. Given what he has said, should not we have expected action and completion during the 18 years in which he was able to deliver?

Mr. MacGregor: The plain fact is that, when the Conservative Government came to power in 1979, no part of the A11 was dual carriageway. I was a Member then, and it used to take me four hours to travel from London to Norfolk. Now, the vast majority of the road is either motorway or dual carriageway, and my journey time has been halved. This Government will never implement the programme on the tiny bit left—the key part. I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is talking about. The Conservative Government made a huge improvement, but we shall not see any improvement from this Government. He knows that the major A47 Norwich southern bypass has hugely improved the position in Norfolk.

I must tell the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner)—I was going to make this point later—that 13 bypasses were built in my constituency while the Conservative Government were in office. [Interruption.] Most of them were not built while I was Secretary of State for Transport; I did not authorise any of them when I held that office. I worked very hard for them for my constituents outside that period in office. Two more such bypasses are needed, but they will never be built under this Government. I defend our record entirely—including in Norfolk. I am very glad that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, because it enabled me to make a point which I hope everyone in Norfolk will recognise.

Mr. Anthony D. Wright (Great Yarmouth): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: No, I will not give way again, because I know that many hon. Members want to speak.

On new roads, it is important to recognise that the road projects that we are talking about, the expenditure on which has been so deeply slashed by the Government, are designed for improvement of the infrastructure, and include motorway widening schemes and bypasses. If one calls bypasses new roads, okay, those are new roads, but they are highly desired by everyone in the locality and are environmentally friendly.

I want to comment on the integrated transport programme. Integrated transport is a fine sounding phrase, but we actually promoted it during our period in office by aligning road and rail, aligning airports and so on. Much more alignment of bus and rail journeys is taking place as a result of privatisation than was ever achieved by central planning. That is evidenced by the fact that the White Paper recognises that no new road network is necessary—in other words, the road network that we established was the right one for an integrated transport planning policy.

The massive hole in the Government's integrated transport policy stems from the fact that they have devastated the road programme, thereby neglecting the one area of transport that takes 90 per cent. of the traffic. That is not what is meant by integrated transport policy. In my view, it is a disadvantageous approach to transport.

That brings me to the road programme generally. The Minister of Transport was far less than fair to my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard); she repeated the figures for expenditure undertaken during the Conservative Administration: £48 billion on transport infrastructure, of which £26 billion was spent on roads. Given that 90 per cent. of traffic goes by road, the fact that just over half of our spending was devoted to roads shows that we did not have an undue bias towards them, but that we acknowledged the importance of expenditure on them.

The balance has now gone completely the other way; that is devastatingly serious.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: No, I will not give way.

In my last year as Secretary of State for Transport, we were spending just over £2 billion on the road programme—the Highways Agency programme. By 1998–99, that had reduced to £1.3 billion and it will reduce in the next three years, although road maintenance will increase. However, the increase in road maintenance in the next three years will bring back the relevant figures, in real terms, to precisely what I was spending on that work in 1993. I do not understand how the Minister of Transport can criticise us for neglecting road maintenance when he is claiming a great deal of credit for the increase that he is making, which will simply bring us straight back to where we were.

Mr. Prentice: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: No; I am sorry, but I will not give way. [Interruption.] Well, I will give way in a moment. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] All right; in fairness to my hon. Friends, I will not.

Therefore spending on road maintenance has not been substantially increased. Moreover, new road projects—bypasses, improvements to motorways and so on—have been cut almost to nothing. Four hundred national road schemes were carried through in the period between 1979 and 1997—400 in 18 years. The Government are planning 37 schemes over seven years. That is the difference. It would take 70 years, under the Government's programme, to achieve what the Conservatives did. That is why the Minister was wrong in the comparisons that he drew.

The worrying aspect of all this is that the combination of all those factors will lead to increasing congestion on our roads and increasing uncompetitiveness, as well as a decline in road maintenance in local authority areas. That brings me to the subject of local authorities.

Mr. Prentice: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: No.

On detrunking, I support the Government. Their proposals to detrunk a substantial number of roads and pass them back to local authorities make sense. I often noticed that some national road schemes had less of a priority at local level than the local road scheme which failed to be included in that national programme. I therefore perfectly understand the principle of detrunking. However, it makes sense only if money goes with it, and I believe that there are only one or two new road projects in this year's transport settlement, the expenditure on which has almost reduced in real terms. Eighty schemes were requested—normal local authority schemes, not detrunking schemes. If one adds the detrunking schemes and examines the programme that the Government are offering, detrunking is a poisoned chalice for local authorities. No funding is going with the programme, so nothing will happen and all those road schemes will be frozen. The Government will try to blame the local authorities, but the fault will lie with the Government.

I shall say a word or two about DBFO—design, build, finance and operate—schemes and motorway tolling. I introduced the DBFOs and I am in favour of them. The Minister has just announced such a scheme—the A130—which I welcome, as I know the great need for it. However, I am worried about DBFOs. When I initiated the programme, I intended that in due course we would be able to introduce motorway tolling. The DBFO schemes to improve motorways would be financed by real income from motorway tolling. That is extremely important.

If the Government concentrate all new road schemes on DBFO and claim the credit—justifiably—for the private sector involvement, they will pile up enormous public expenditure later on the DBFO schemes. Those should be accounted for separately. Motorway tolling would provide genuine money to pay for such schemes, so there would be a genuine private finance initiative, genuinely costed and properly implemented. There is a serious danger if all future road schemes, or most of them, are done by DBFO. I hope that the Government will look to that.

I make no apology for having argued for motorway tolling. I issued a Green Paper proposing it, and I still think that it is the right way to improve our motorways. It gets revenue in to provide a better service. When the technology is available, which is the problem at present, the policy should be pursued. I regret that the Government are not putting enough initiative and push behind attempts to improve the technology. Congestion charging is entirely different and gives rise to many more problems than motorway tolling.

On the fuel duty escalator, I shall add one or two points to those that my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk made. The environmental background to the introduction of the fuel duty escalator in 1993 has changed. There have been huge reductions in toxic emissions as a result of catalytic converters and other improvements in technology. Toxic emissions have fallen by 30 per cent. since 1993. That is a much more effective contribution to the global warming target than the fuel duty escalator will achieve.

Reducing toxic emissions acts directly on the issue. The fuel duty escalator has outlived its usefulness. It is producing tiny, if any, environmental benefits. All the revenue coming in from it is going not on environmental expenditure, but elsewhere. Let us admit that it is a means for the Chancellor to raise revenue for other purposes, and it does not achieve its objective.

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) rose—

Mr. MacGregor: No, I am not giving way.

I strongly support the Government in their endeavours to reduce toxic emissions and in the improvement of the technology of cars. I would happily endorse any programme to pull in polluting cars, impose heavy fines for lorries and so on. I believe that what the Chancellor introduced in a puny way could be developed further. The vehicle excise duty reduction on 13 types of car out of several hundred is another example of a flashy new scheme pulled out of the hat to look good, but which does not amount to much. I hope it will be built on, because it is the right way to tackle matters.

Dr. Reid: The scheme is a start.

Mr. MacGregor: A pretty modest start, if I may say so.

The fuel duty escalator is not the way to deal with the environmental issue, because it is causing more harm than the environmental benefits that it may produce. It is causing huge harm to rural areas, people on low incomes and those who depend on their car. People are coming to us in droves to complain about the Chancellor's Budget, as is the road haulage industry. It is time to end the fuel duty escalator.

My conclusion is simple. While the Government speak about an integrated transport policy, the country is seeing the results in practice and it does not like what it sees, as the recent BBC poll showed. The Chancellor talks of improving the nation's investment in infrastructure, but is destroying it by not putting anything like enough money into it. Anyone in business knows that one should be spending about 10 per cent. of the value of one's capital assets every year on their renewal, or certainly as much as depreciation. We have a capital asset here of £230 million, but we are spending practically nothing on maintaining and renewing it. Not only is that damaging the economy, but it is already clear that the electorate has tumbled to the fact that the Government's transport policy is failing the nation.

Mrs. Diana Organ (Forest of Dean): There is now widespread consensus that the past road policy of simply building, or wishing to build, more and more roads was not sustainable, could never be the answer to traffic growth and congestion, and would not in itself provide efficient transportation for people, goods and services.

The Conservative Government's policy was dominated by deregulation, privatisation and a road building frenzy. The damaging consequences of that policy are starkly illustrated in rural areas such as the Forest of Dean.

First, the 1985 bus deregulation led to the decimation and fragmentation of bus public transport, so that by 1997 even the main market towns in the Forest of Dean were not connected to one another by a bus service. That forced many rural dwellers on low incomes to sacrifice much in order to maintain a car on the road. If they did not do that, they were at the mercy of and wholly dependent on a dwindling public transport network, or they ended up isolated.

The other strand of the previous Administration's policy was privatisation, which had an equally detrimental effect. In 1992, a short but strategically crucial section of road was privatised—the Severn bridge. In that deal, tolls were allowed to be increased greatly and could be collected one way only. That was carried out without consultation, without public representation from local communities and without a study or a consideration of the impact that that would have on regional traffic flows and movement.

The main impact was on the roads of the Forest of Dean. They have become rat runs for lorries avoiding the tolls. Any heavy goods vehicle travelling from the west midlands or east of Gloucester to south Wales looks to those roads as a rat run. A regular census shows that, between 1992 and 1998, there has been an increase of more than 10 per cent. in the number of heavy goods vehicles of 3.5 tonnes and over trying to avoid the tolls. That is an extra 100 vehicles a day. Roughly 40,000 extra vehicles a year go through village communities along the A48, A40 and A4136, and often parts of those roads are unsuitable to such traffic, which causes noise, damages buildings, affects the quality of life and threatens the safety of pedestrians.

The third part of the previous Conservative Government's predict and provide policy of more and more roads was equally threatening. There had been a proposal in the early 1990s to build a multi-million pound A40 extension from Gloucester westwards. That would have brought extra development to the river Severn floodplain, increasing the possibility of flood damage, and taking away many wonderful water meadows and sites of valuable flora. Fortunately, that scheme faced widespread opposition and, thankfully, was rejected.

This Government's integrated approach to transport has already shown real benefits and is a realistic way forward in the Forest of Dean. The integrated approach is inclusive. It consults, but realises that local communities can often solve their own transport problems and become effective.

Children in Berry Hill primary school looked at the problem that many of them had of travelling to and from school in cars because their parents were concerned about their safety. The children questioned each other about their journeys, plotted a route for a bus to take them to and from school, and then took the initiative, writing to bus companies to ask whether they would be interested in running a bus service. With a little funding from the local authority, the scheme went ahead. Now, that school has a bus service which the children say is enjoyable and a real social opportunity for them, and which has reduced early morning congestion.

The Government recognise that local solutions can often be valuable, and their policy of allowing local authorities to draw up local transport plans, setting out their proposals for the management, maintenance and development of local roads, works. My local authority, Gloucestershire, thinks that that is definitely a better approach. The plans not only must be sustainable, but must involve all local parties in their execution.

In October 1998 I carried out a constituency-wide consultation on the Government's transport White Paper. It was widely recognised that all community parties must be involved, as should the planning authority, which has a major role to play on transport issues. Where developments are sited, how big they are and their impact on traffic flows and transportation are crucial.

A legacy of housing's predict and provide days was a proposal to build 2,000 houses on green-field sites around the village settlements of Sedbury and Tutshill. That area is close to Chepstow, the M4 and the Severn bridge. The present Government's housing policy says that new housing must be sustainable, centred on economic centres and it must follow the sequential principle. Those criteria meant that the proposal was rejected, thankfully—principally because it was recognised that 2,000 new homes would generate a vast increase in commuter traffic. People would have moved out of the urban areas of Avon and south Wales to those new homes and, consequently, commuted daily by road to their jobs in those centres.

We have inherited a lot of failures in the Forest of Dean, but they are being addressed. The Labour Government have invested £50 million in rural transport and, in the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced a 20 per cent. increase in that spending—it will rise to more than £120 million over the next two years. That is a significant increase on previous levels and the rise in bus fuel duty rebate will also help.

The increase has already had a significant impact on rural public transport in the Forest of Dean, delivering 11 new bus services, and, for the first time, we have a Sunday service to Gloucester. It has also led to the appointment of a transport broker and co-ordinator who will consider how rural areas can develop the increasing numbers of innovative community transport and car-sharing schemes.

In addition, the announcement of a national half-price concessionary fare scheme for pensioners has been widely welcomed by the 29 per cent. of my constituents who qualify. I hope, as they do, that it can be delivered as soon as possible.

Instead of building more roads, the Government have changed the focus of road investment and their top priority is maintaining and managing existing roads and getting them to work better. Our major concern is safety, because 70 per cent. of fatal accidents occur on rural roads. Excessive speed is the main cause of a third of those accidents. In our surgeries every week we all hear the distressing tales that are brought to us by the relatives of victims of such accidents.

[Mrs. Diana Organ]

The A48 had a dreadful history of accidents. A route study of the road was undertaken because it was identified as atypical, due to the accident level. The Highways Agency made available £268,000 and a comprehensive package was introduced, including speed cameras, high-friction surfacing on the approaches to bridges, warning signs, gateway signs for villages, white lining to upgrade laning and the giving of directions and other traffic-calming measures.

The results of those measures have been phenomenal and very impressive. Accident and casualty statistics have come down, to 35 accidents and 50 casualties in 1998 against a high of 64 accidents in 1989 and 68 casualties in 1992. A similar programme has been outlined for the A40, in order to improve safety on that road. I hope that that programme reaps the same benefits.

This year's local transport capital settlement for Gloucestershire is the highest yet, with a large element of the £9.25 million going on improved maintenance on those important roads. There is a £2 million package for safety schemes, such as that for the A48. Although that allocation is generous, I must make my plea for the Government to look favourably on bids to improve the A4136, which is a prime access route to the heart of the forest and its industries. We were unsuccessful with our £11 million major scheme, and I understand why—it does not come within Government policy—but I hope that future bids from Gloucestershire for sections of that road to be upgraded, for the safety of road users and pedestrians alike, will be treated favourably.

The A48 and A40 are trunk roads that have been identified in the trunk roads review for possible detrunking. This is a complex and emotive issue, and there will need to be widespread consultations—which did not happen under the previous Government on the Severn bridge changes—on the implications of detrunking those routes and how that will affect the communities and the economy of the Forest of Dean, which rely heavily on manufacturing.

The county council was concerned that it would not obtain sufficient funding for maintenance should those roads be handed over to the local authority. It tells me that it has been seriously reassured by the discussions that it has had with the Government about the grants allocated for those roads. The officers tell me that they are happy about the funds moving across, which they say will meet their requirements. That offers us an opportunity to control and manage the heavy goods vehicles that are avoiding the Severn bridge tolls. By the imposition of weight restrictions, with exemptions for lorries accessing the Forest of Dean, we shall tackle another of the problems inherited from the previous Administration.

Transport problems will not be solved overnight: that takes time. This is a huge issue, but the Forest of Dean has already benefited from the Government's policies. They are making headway at a local level to improve transport for all the community.

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): I welcome the opportunity to discuss roads and transport issues generally. I am pleased that the Tories have used their Opposition day for that purpose. It is pity that the debate is not longer. However, the Tories have blotted their copybook by the words they have chosen for their motion—which is brazen, to say the least. It is a year zero motion that pretends that nothing happened between 1979 and now, and that they have no responsibility for the transport system that we have today.

Our present transport infrastructure has been built up—or not built up—over the 18 years of a Conservative Government. If the Conservatives want to maximise their influence on transport issues, they should have a little more humility and recognise that they made mistakes when they were in government. There is no indication of that in their motion. It shows their usual arrogance—the arrogance that caused them to lose the last election.

An alternative Tory motion might have been, "That this House adopts a policy of collective amnesia in respect of the years 1979 to 1997, ignores the catastrophic failure of Tory transport policy during those years, and begs for the Tory party to be allowed to reinvent itself." That is what the motion says if we read between the lines. Incredulity is the word that describes the Tories' approach.

The Conservatives talk about congestion and pollution, which they seem to be concerned about in the motion. Between 1979 and 1997, motor vehicle traffic increased every year—cumulatively by a total of 75 per cent. There was a growth of traffic for each type of vehicle, but the largest increase was in cars, at 82 per cent. In 1979, when the Tories came to power, the mileage covered by cars in the United Kingdom was 200 billion km. In 1997, that figure had reached 370 billion km, which is almost twice as much, whereas the figures for bus and motorcycle usage dropped during that period.

It is clear that under the previous Government there was an increase in traffic, congestion and pollution. If the Tories want us to take their transport policies seriously, they must acknowledge that fact and start from a new base, not from the fictional base in the motion.

Mr. Gray: What about the Government's policies?

Mr. Baker: I shall come to the Government's policies in a moment, but we are discussing the Conservative motion. If the Tories think that I am going to let them get off scot-free, given their motion, they have another think coming.

The Tories could not build their way out of a crisis. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) made a reasonable contribution based on his experience as a former Secretary of State for Transport. However, the fact of the matter is that the Tories had a substantial road-building programme; I am happy to acknowledge that. Capital expenditure on roads was more than £50 billion between 1979 and 1997. Between 1986 and 1996, almost 1,700 km of motorway and trunk roads were completed. As the 1989 White Paper "Roads to Prosperity" stated, that was the biggest road-building programme since the Romans. Some of them were not built, as we have heard, but a considerable amount was undertaken and completed. But what has been the result of that road-building programme? It has been more congestion, more pollution and more transport problems.

We cannot build our way out of transport problems. There is no point in going on about which bypasses are not here and which trunk roads are not there; we cannot solve transport problems by building more and more roads. I thought that all hon. Members had learned that lesson, but it seems that the Conservatives have unlearned it.

Before Conservative Members complain about the effect of the Budget on the motorist, they should bear in mind that between 1974 and 1996, according to Government figures—the last Government's figures, in fact—the real cost of motoring fell by 3.5 per cent. Over the same period, rail fares rose in real terms by 74.8 per cent. During those Tory years—and, indeed, the years of Harold Wilson and Jim Callaghan—bus fares rose by 57.5 per cent. We must deal with the fundamental flaws in our transport system. Building more and more roads is an antiquated 1950s solution, which I hope the Conservatives will now reject because it simply will not work.

In an earlier intervention, I referred to the report of the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment. That report demonstrated beyond doubt that building more and more roads and creating more and more road space—that includes the widening of roads, as well as the building of new roads—leads to an increase in the number of journeys that are made. People are now commuting from Reigate to Watford; they would never have done so before the M25 was built. Some hon. Members may see that as an example of freedom, but I see it merely as the undertaking of an unnecessary journey. It is a great pity that so many journeys are now made by road that were not made by road previously.

Mr. Jenkin: Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that the M25 should not have been built?

Mr. Baker: I am suggesting that its creation has led to a huge increase in the number of vehicle movements. Before it was built, I used to travel along roads close to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, I think. I used to use the A128. Progress was slow—there were traffic jams—but the number of vehicle movements increased dramatically as soon as the M25 was built.

I shall now deal with road fuel duties. We have heard from numerous speakers about the escalator introduced by the Conservative Government. When the Conservatives are cooing to the Automobile Association about how much they sympathise with it, they should remember that between 1992–93 and 1996–97 the revenue from all duty and value-added tax on road fuel was £80 billion. During the same period, only £16.1 billion was spent on public transport. [Interruption.] If the Conservatives want to blame the Government—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Some hon. Members are interrupting the hon. Gentleman's speech, which is not allowed.

Mr. Baker: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for defending me so stoutly.

The Conservatives appear to be arguing that the present Government are taxing motorists unfairly, and using the money for other purposes. I must tell them that they did the same when they were in government. We are not allowed to use the word "hypocritical"—I believe that it is unparliamentary—but what they did then is significantly at variance with what they are saying now.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): Does the hon. Gentleman not realise—I am thinking particularly of diesel fuel duty—that by raising the escalator to such a level, and so many times, the Government are simply replacing the fumes from British lorries with fumes from Belgian, French and German lorries? There is no environmental gain whatever.

Mr. Baker: I accept that there is a problem with the fuel duty escalator as it relates to the road haulage industry. I have met Steve Norris to discuss that very issue. I think that the Government should concentrate on increasing European Union levels rather than on reducing them here, but I agree that there is a problem that must be dealt with.

Although we are debating a Conservative motion, let us waste no more time on the Conservatives. Theirs has been a catastrophic catalogue of failure—a lamentable indictment of their hopelessly ineffective and inappropriate dogma over 18 years—but let us now leave them to one side. Let us leave their great car economy—the Great Britain snarl-up; let us leave the biggest road-building programme since the Romans—the biggest traffic jam of all time—and consider the Government's roads policy.

I welcome the fact that the Government produced a White Paper on transport, and that it contained radical and good ideas. Ministers and hon. Members will appreciate that I am not averse to criticising the Government when they get it wrong, but the fact is that the Government produced a good White Paper on transport. The trouble is that not much action has followed it. The jury is still out on whether the Government will deliver everything that they said in the White Paper that they wanted to do.

Part of the problem has been that, although there has been some very good thinking in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, its thinking has not been matched by support from elsewhere in Government. "Blair and Brown on the line"—perhaps the wrong type of Chancellor—has been offered as an excuse for delaying action in changing the Government's transport policy from road to rail.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A trend seems to be emerging in some speeches, which I might be able to stop now. References to other hon. Members should include their constituency name or their title. Perhaps "the Prime Minister" or "the Chancellor of the Exchequer", for example, would be better terms of reference in the Chamber.

Mr. Baker: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I entirely agree with you, and apologise for making those references.

I shall be happy with the Government when they have introduced the Strategic Rail Authority. The Deputy Prime Minister—for all his commitment, and that of his Ministers, which I do not doubt—has, so far, not been able to secure parliamentary time for introduction of legislation on that authority, for which there is no substitute. Shouting at train operating companies is not a substitute for proper legislation on a strategic rail authority.

We are also still unclear about the powers of Railtrack. We still do not know what Alastair Morton will be doing, or what investment will be made in rail transport. If the Government are to turn their words into positive action, we will have to have from them some definite answers and clear action.

[Mr. Baker]

I acknowledge that the Budget contained some positive measures, such as the very long overdue one ending company car abuse. I was very pleased to see that. I was pleased also that the Budget contained money for rural buses.

The Budget made a start on changing vehicle excise duty. However, I agree with the right hon. Member for South Norfolk that that will go only a very short way. It is no use saying that the provision was only a first step—why not take all the steps in one go? Only 9 per cent. of cars now on the road are 1100 cc or smaller. Therefore, only one in 11 cars will benefit from the Government's VED changes. Moreover, only 5 per cent. of 1998 new car registrations were 1100 cc or smaller. Therefore, only one in 20 of those cars will benefit from the change.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the real significance of the VED changes is not the single change this year, on cars below 1100 cc, but the announcement that, next year, a completely variable VED system will be introduced? Is he aware that the new VED system has been delayed because of an argument about the best way of measuring—by engine size or emissions—a variable VED system? The Government have accepted the research and come out in favour of measuring emissions. That is why it has taken so long. As I said, the real improvement will be made next year, when the fully variable VED system is introduced.

Mr. Baker: I should like to think that the hon. Gentleman is right. However, the Government have been in power for almost two years, and I should have thought that—not just in this Budget, but in the previous one—they could have analysed the matter and proposed a proper solution. I am always suspicious of Governments who embark on reviews and consultations, as those are often used as an excuse for inaction. Nevertheless, I hope that he is right, and that we shall have some action on the matter in the next Budget.

My greatest criticism so far of the Government's transport policy is on road traffic reduction. When in opposition, many Labour Members—including the Minister for Transport in London, who is in the Chamber—were committed to real reductions in road traffic levels. There was a recognition that, for environmental, health and social reasons, we could not continue increasing the number of vehicles and vehicle miles driven on our roads.

The intellectual argument on the need to stop the increase has been won. Hundreds of Labour and other Members signed up to road traffic reduction. At the end of the previous Parliament, my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) promoted his Road Traffic Reduction Bill. Subsequently, the hon. Member for Ceredigion promoted his Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Bill. At the start of this Parliament, the Government were committed to road traffic reduction, but that has changed. In a written answer that I received from the Minister for Transport in London on 3 November last year, the policy changed to:

"we need to reduce the rate of road traffic growth."

I am afraid that that is the Conservative policy with life breathed back into it by the new Government. In layman's terms, it means that the Government are going to deal with congestion by allowing more cars on the road doing more mileage. That is a wrong policy.

Further on in the written answer, the Minister said:

"we want to see an absolute reduction in traffic in those places and streets where the greatest environmental damage is done."—[Official Report, 3 November 1998; Vol. 318, c. 458.]

The implication is that traffic levels may go down in places such as Chester, Bath or York, but overall levels of road traffic in this country will go up. That is a failed, unsustainable policy that the Government must correct. The parliamentary answers that I have received from the Minister and her colleagues in recent days have been opaque, so I should like her to tell us clearly the projections for road traffic growth during this Parliament. What is the Government's aim? Which areas will have actual reductions in traffic levels? What will the overall effect be?

Another more recent written answer on 12 January said:

"Using the National Road Traffic Forecast model it is estimated that with these policies"— set out in the previous paragraph—

"in place traffic would grow by 37 per cent. by 2010 relative to 1990 vehicle kilometre levels."—[Official Report, 12 January 1999; Vol. 323, c. 189.]

That is almost identical to the previous Government's figures for growth if no action was taken. What is the Government's policy on road traffic reduction? Will the Minister guarantee that by the end of this Parliament the amount of traffic on our roads will be lower than at the moment? If she will not, she should withdraw her name from the letters and motions that she signed in the previous Parliament and accept that she was wrong. I hope that she does not have to do that. I hope that I have misunderstood the policy and there will be an absolute reduction in road traffic during this Parliament. I look forward to hearing from her on that.

To sum up, the Conservatives have a bit of a cheek in tabling the motion. They undermine their case with their words. The Government have published a White Paper, but they have not yet enacted the measures in it. We want some action before the end of this Parliament.

5.52 pm

Mrs. Christine Butler (Castle Point): I sincerely thank my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport for his efforts in securing the A130 private finance initiative bid, worth £92 million for Essex. Many hon. Members, on both sides of the House, will welcome that. If I had not heard that announcement today, I would have been asking for it. My right hon. Friend's decision is right. It is the right answer to the high rate of accidents, the crushing congestion and the unremitting costs to travellers and the economy of south Essex caused by a road that amounts to nothing less than a blockade at times.

South-east Essex is heavily populated, with almost a third of a million people in 40 square miles. Essex people are some of the most enterprising in the country, but without that important road scheme our local economy could stagnate. Castle Point, Southend, Rochford and Rayleigh are aware of the problems and are getting together in a sub-regional approach to explain what we need to keep business thriving and to steer a course towards success in the region.

Road safety has not been mentioned enough in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ) mentioned it, but it is worth returning to the subject. I could weep at the toll that the present A130 is having on families in Essex, many of whom are from my constituency. Any level of personal injury from road traffic accidents is unacceptable, but this road has a terrible record. The jams, bunch-ups and pile-ups all point to one solution: the scheme that my right hon. Friend the Minister has announced this evening. Some sections of the route are so narrow that one tractor might cause tailbacks for miles in the morning. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), who is sitting next to me, has probably experienced that many times on the way to his constituency. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport has listened to the arguments, and I thank him for throwing a lifeline to south Essex.

Other hon. Members want to speak, so I will not say all that I intended to say. However, I wish to refer to sustainability. The word trips easily off the tongue, but it is an important word. For the first time, we have a genuine attempt, through joined-up thinking across all Departments, to try to deliver sustainability. Those attempts should not be sneered at. We have hardly begun, and there is more to follow in legislation.

We cannot go on deciding where houses go, where major transportation corridors might be, where inward investment must locate and where jobs are created without considering all of them in parallel. Without such planning—and the tough decisions that will follow—we will get nowhere. That is a message that we have taken on board. We will deal with it in the regional plans after 1 April, when the regional development agencies start to work with the regional chambers to deliver sustainability, along with increases in GDP per capita.

To deliver a sustainable economy with more investment and more jobs—along with sustainability in the environment—is not easy. That is why it has not even been attempted before. Now it is being attempted. We should stop the snide remarks and the party politics and give credit to the Government for what they have done so far, and for the measures that we will take in the not-too-distant future.

5.58 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): In approaching the debate, I was not sure what tone of voice to adopt—whether it should be sadness or anger. In the hope of winning the sympathy of the Minister for something that I will say later in my speech—a matter with which she is well familiar—I will adopt the tone of sadness, which I shall try to combine with honesty and brevity.

The brevity is made possible by the excellent speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), who said many of the things that I would have wished to say. The honesty is forced upon me by the admission that I was never comfortable with the fuel duty escalator, and I am certainly not at all comfortable with its increase and continuance under this Government. A question of straw and the camel's back comes to mind. When the back is breaking, it is time to take the straw off.

Road haulage is a big employer in my constituency. I cannot pretend that that is always particularly welcome, because of the severe environmental impact that it has on many villages in the vale of Evesham. However, it is there, it is inevitable, it is not going away and it creates many jobs.

The modern economy is dependent on road haulage, as has been generally accepted in what has been a constructive debate. I had a visit from a haulier at my constituency surgery on Saturday, who said that it would be a good idea to organise a week-long strike of the road haulage industry—if it could be guaranteed that it would be total. For the first couple of days, the British people would say that it was wonderful that the roads were empty; on days three and four, as the supermarket shelves started to empty, they would feel rather differently; by the end of the week, they would be crying for the lorries to get back on the roads. I think that that haulier was right.

That operator told me that he is spending £500 a lorry to increase the size of the tanks, so that he will only ever have to fill up in France. He reckons that he will recoup the cost of the new tanks within two and a half journeys to and from the continent. The Chancellor should think about that. I was in Ulster last week, talking to hauliers and taxi drivers. The land border and the devaluation of the euro make the problem even worse there. I imagine that hardly any petrol or diesel is sold in Northern Ireland these days.

When a Government have got something wrong, there is no shame in admitting it. It is time for the Chancellor to admit that he has got it wrong and to reverse the changes. The Minister's clever statistics in his opening speech do not bear critical scrutiny, and the fact is that there is now a huge and unjustifiable differential.

I hope that the Government will be sympathetic to intervention in local problems where road haulage is an environmental issue, as in my constituency. I have written this week to the Deputy Prime Minister, asking him to intervene in my patch where there is a bad problem with road haulage, as three counties meet at one point and there is no effective integration. If the Government's integrated transport strategy is to mean anything at all, it should mean intervening in such situations.

Conservative Members have made the point—Labour Members may also have done so, but if so, I missed it—that the increase in petrol duties and the token reduction in vehicle excise duties will have a devastating impact on poorer motorists in rural areas.

Mr. Chaytor: Has the hon. Gentleman seen the latest research, available in the Library, by Mr. Skinner and Mr. Fergusson of the Institute of European Environmental Policy, which exhaustively analyses the impact of different policies on different categories of motorist? It proves fairly conclusively that the Government's policy of reducing the fixed costs and increasing the variable costs helps poorer motorists. I suggest that he looks at the research before making—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Luff: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I happen to agree with the spirit of what the hon. Gentleman said. I find it a little difficult to argue with the principle of reducing the fixed costs and increasing the variable costs, but it must be done in a much more meaningful way. The token reduction in vehicle excise duty will have no impact at all on my poorer constituents. They cannot afford to change down to smaller cars, because of the capital costs involved.

There is a direct financial impact on my rural constituents, who have no realistic hope of a comprehensive bus service ever being restored to their villages, even if the odd improvements here and there are welcome. Those people depend on their cars for getting to the doctor, to work or to school, and for doing their shopping. The Government's policies are having a disproportionate effect on my poorer constituents, especially in areas such as the Vale of Evesham, where there is no real prospect of any significant improvement in public transport.

Those people have a democratic right to freedom of movement. At the end of the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st, the freedom of mobility is as important as the freedom of speech was to previous generations. As democrats, we should respect that principle.

The Minister talked about the increase in the budget for repairs and maintenance on trunk roads, and my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk largely demolished his argument. At county council level, the budget for road repair and maintenance has been squeezed out of sight, and especially in rural shires. I do not know what the standard spending assessment for road maintenance in Worcestershire is, but it is made irrelevant by the disgracefully low SSA for social services.

Everything that should be available for other services is poured into social services. That must be right, because the protection of vulnerable people by social services departments should be a priority in any civilised society, but the result is that the potholes in Worcestershire are becoming a disgrace, the roads are becoming dangerous and maintenance is falling alarmingly behind schedule. To be fair to the Minister, there is not much that she can do about that, because the problem is the Government's underfunding of social services in rural shires.

I share my right hon. Friend's concern about detrunking. Given the squeeze on county council finances, there is a real risk that detrunking will impose a huge and unaffordable burden on county councils, which will then get the blame for not maintaining the roads effectively. To be fair, I should say that the Highways Agency is doing a good job bringing the roads up to scratch, prior to detrunking, and I wish to put on record my deep gratitude to the agency and the Government for what has been done to the A449 between Worcester and Kidderminster, which will make what was a killer road much safer.

I am slightly less grateful for the Government's failure to act in the matter of the Wyre Piddle bypass, and that also raises important wider points. I am glad to see a smile on the Minister's lips because we have talked about that bypass on many occasions. It is also important because it would bypass the town of Pershore in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer). It was next in the queue. Worcestershire has done well on bypasses, because we have the Broadway, Worcester Western, Norton-Lenchwick and Evesham bypasses. They have all been built without the significant traffic generation consequences that the Liberals fear, and they have provided a genuinely better environment for the people of those towns.

The Wyre Piddle bypass has been turned down twice by this Government, and they now propose a non-roads solution. I understand that there are non-roads solutions to urban traffic problems, but there are no non-roads solutions to rural bypasses. A community such as Wyre Piddle faces problems caused by bottlenecks and heavy lorries going to the landfill sites. Of course, the Government may have heard that I have nearly been involved in two accidents with lorries in Wyre Piddle, but they do not want the road built because they hope for a by-election in Mid-Worcestershire. However, they would get a shock if that were to happen. I ask the Minister to reconsider that decision on a road with no adverse environmental consequences. Not a single tree would be cut down for that road.

I am very disappointed by a response I received yesterday from Ministers. They said that they would not visit Wyre Piddle to observe the situation, and the ground they gave for that decision was extraordinary:

"Any visit in advance of that consideration"— of the case in this year's local transport plan bid—

"would be premature."—[Official Report, 17 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 669.]

When else are they to visit except before they make a decision? After a decision is made, it is clearly too late. The Anchor in Wyre Piddle is a fine pub: I hope that I can have a drink with the Minister there and that we can discuss the problem. She is a reasonable woman, and I am sure that she will be able to see the case for the road.

In conclusion, I wish to raise a point of principle. We in Worcestershire want two bypasses: Bordersley and Wyre Piddle. They could both be paid for out of a fraction of the increase in fuel duty that will be paid by Worcestershire motorists over the next three years. If the Government hypothecate only a tiny bit of that increase in revenue, they will make the lives of dwellers in rural England far better.

6.8 pm

Ms Rosie Winterton (Doncaster, Central): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate. It is important to get roads policy right, not only for the sake of our economy—many right hon. and hon. Members have referred to 90 per cent. of all journeys being made by road—but because of the need for policies that will reduce congestion. Congestion damages not only business, but the environment.

I am a member of the RAC Foundation's public policy committee, and I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends will be pleased to learn that the RAC welcomed the "New Deal for Transport" White Paper, and said that it represented a good change in approach from the predict and provide model of the previous Government, under whose stewardship road and bridge maintenance deteriorated alarmingly. The new approach of improving management of the trunk road network, and investing in road maintenance so that maximum use of the network can be made, is the key to improving the lives of motorists, as the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) pointed out, although he is no longer in his place.

Motorists have also welcomed the radical change of approach in hypothecating revenue from road pricing to improve public transport, and the Government's strong commitment to improving urban and rural public transport so that there is a viable alternative to car journeys. As my hon. Friends have pointed out, local transport plans have a vital role to play in achieving the Government's integrated transport plan.

The Government's priority of maintaining existing roads and bridges must be reflected at local authority level. It is difficult to overestimate the importance of routine planned maintenance of roads. Maintenance is not just about improving road safety for car users; it can improve the quality of life for those living near roads and it can reduce noise pollution. A good road surface is important for pedestrians, cyclists and motor cyclists.

When he was not referring to pubs in Wyre Piddle, the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) referred to the problems created by potholes. I very much agree with what he said. A war on potholes would be welcome, if the Minister could declare one.

The general situation is not helped by the constant digging up of roads by public utilities so that pipes can be mended or cables laid. Local authorities seem unable to get to grips with doing anything about that problem, and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport's statement provided good news for motorists in the form of a Bill on public streetworks. Government support for that will be very welcome.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Before the hon. Lady leaves the subject of local government and roads, would she reflect on a national study by the County Surveyors Society, which indicated that £5.25 billion must be spent if local authority roads are to be brought up to the standard set out in the local authority code of practice?

Ms Winterton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for calling attention to the previous Government's failure to invest in roads. That failure is also reflected in a parliamentary briefing from the Automobile Association. It notes that the backlog in roads maintenance will cost £5 billion, which is plainly the result of the actions of the Conservative Government.

It is important that the 23 million motorists in the United Kingdom should be represented on the forthcoming commission for integrated transport. I should be grateful if the Minister could tell me when the commission's membership is likely to be announced, and if she could give us an assurance that road users will be properly represented.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport stressed how important integration is. There is an excellent example in Doncaster of how the Government are integrating transport through the funding of support for the North Bridge road project and the building of a new transport interchange. The existing road takes more than 60,000 vehicles a day. Queues over the bridge are horrendous during rush hour, and pollution levels rise. Access to the railway station is difficult and unreliable. Communities outside the town centre become isolated because of access problems.

The project will reduce congestion, and it will let the council introduce a quality bus corridor which will give buses priority over other vehicles, and allow for segregated facilities for cyclists and pedestrians. It is an excellent example of how roads can be used to promote integrated transport. It brings together access to rail-based transport, major improvements to public transport and improvements for general traffic. All that will assist in the economic regeneration of Doncaster, while also reducing pollution. It is a good example of joined-up Government thinking.

Along with the Doncaster interchange—a partnership between Government, the local authority and the private sector—that North Bridge road project will make it easier for people who want to change from one mode of transport to another to do so. That is integrated transport at its best and it is welcomed in my constituency.

The Conservative Government's road policy failed the people of Doncaster; in 1994, funding for the North Bridge relief road project was withdrawn by the Tories after £7.5 million of public money had been spent to put the scheme together. The Labour Government are making integrated sustainable transport a reality; that is good news not only for the motorist, but for cyclists, motor cyclists and pedestrians. I assure my right hon. and hon. Friends that my constituents and I already see the results of that new approach, which we warmly welcome. I congratulate the Government on taking swift action to put right the dismal record of the previous Conservative Government.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), although that name does not have the same resonance and romance as "the hon. Member for Wyre Piddle"—my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), who spoke before her and whose well-argued speech we all greatly enjoyed.

Labour's pre-election pledge on transport promised "immediate benefits" to the travelling public. I cannot remember whether it was one of their early pledges or a general pledge, but nothing could be clearer than "immediate benefits". However, if we are to believe the representatives of the AA, with whom a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House had lunch today, the travelling public are bitterly disappointed by the fact that they have seen no benefits of any kind—immediate or otherwise. Before the Budget, the level of satisfaction with the Government on transport was about 15 per cent.—the worst of all their satisfaction ratings. Since the Budget, public satisfaction with Labour's transport policies has gone off the Richter scale; some say that it is about 3 per cent., others that there is zero satisfaction among the travelling public.

It is an absolute disgrace; the Government have had two years to do something and they have done nothing. I say "nothing", but the speech of the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central was a classic example of what the Government have done; they love expressions such as "joined-up Government" and "integrated transport White Paper". However, let us consider the White Paper and what it promised. Where is the strategic rail authorities Bill? Where is the tonnage tax promised by the Minister when she gave evidence recently to the Transport Sub-Committee? She gave a strong indication that a tonnage tax would be introduced. Where is it? Nowhere.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that what he has just told the House bears no relation to what I said to the Transport Sub-Committee. I ask him to withdraw those remarks.

Mr. Gray: We seem to have touched a raw nerve. If what I said bore no relation to the hon. Lady's evidence to the Sub-Committee, I would happily withdraw it and apologise. However, my clear impression and—I think—that of other members of the Sub-Committee who are in the Chamber of the hon. Lady's evidence was that she and her colleagues in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions were passionately in favour of the tonnage tax, that she hoped that it would be included in the forthcoming Budget and that she would be extremely disappointed if it were not. That is all on record.

Ms Jackson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. George Stevenson (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gray: If I may, I should prefer to give way to the hon. Gentleman, who is one of my colleagues on the Sub-Committee.

Mr. Stevenson: I fear that I must tell the hon. Gentleman that his recollection is incorrect. Although there was a significant amount of debate and questioning on the tonnage tax—which, by the way, relates to shipping, not to roads—my hon. Friend the Minister gave no such commitment as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Gray: I accept that; there was no firm commitment, merely a clear impression. Under instruction from my Whips, I shall take no further interventions on that point, but we can read the record of the proceedings of the Sub-Committee and of today's debate.

There is huge disappointment among the travelling public about all Labour's transport policies. Those policies have amounted to nothing: all mouth and no trousers, like so many of Labour's other policies. As a result of last week's Budget, the Government have hit rock bottom in public perception of their record on motoring. The Government's aim seems to be to tax the private motorist off the road. Currently, private motorists throughout the nation pay about £1,000 a year in taxes on petrol and car ownership. That figure includes the towns. In rural areas, it is twice that amount: people pay £2,000 to £3,000 a year to run their cars. In rural areas such as my constituency, most families—even the poorest—have two cars. So we are talking about motoring expenses of £4,000 or £5,000 from very small incomes.

The Government have put up petrol prices by an extraordinary 6 per cent., and apparently the escalator will continue. The Government make great play of the fact that a Conservative Government introduced the escalator—and they are right. However, when people ride an escalator at a department store or an hotel, they get off when they get to their destination. Now that United Kingdom petrol prices are more expensive than those of any other country in the world, I suggest that we have got where we are going. We are very close to achieving our Kyoto targets. We have achieved 10 per cent. of our 12.5 per cent. target and will easily attain the full 12.5 per cent. through changes in energy generation.

The Government also propose congestion and parking charges, both of which would do nothing but hammer the private motorist. They are revenue-raising proposals and have nothing to do with the environment. It is significant that, having given his imprimatur to the proposals as environmental taxes, the Deputy Prime Minister was then packed off to the Maldives for a bit of shark fishing so that he could not comment during the Budget process. The truth is that they are not environmental taxes: they will not reduce car use, help with congestion or cut pollution levels. The proposals are aimed simply at raising a large amount of revenue, and it is important for the Government to come clean and admit that.

Worst of all is the tax on lorries. Earlier in the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) challenged the Minister of Transport to disclose how much tax would be paid on a 1,000-litre tank of petrol. It will now cost £644 to fill that tank in the United Kingdom, but £340 in Belgium. The vehicle excise duty for 38-tonne, five-axle lorries has increased from £3,310 to £5,750 in Britain. The comparative figure in France is £269. That is an outrageous increase.

The Government are determined to tax the private motorist off the road and the lorry driver off to the continent. It is a disgrace and, like the rest of the Government's transport policies, amounts to nothing. The Government are all talk and no trousers, except when it comes to taxing the motorist into the ground.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): I welcome the progress that the Government have made on roads policy over the past two years. It is fair to say that the political landscape has been transformed in all aspects of transport policy.

As time is short, I shall make three brief points. The first concerns traffic reduction. The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) was the only hon. Member to refer to the report of the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment, which was produced in the early 1990s when the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) was in office. That report concluded that new roads do not reduce congestion but, as the right hon. Gentleman said, its real significance was in signalling an end, once and for all, to the predict and provide model.

The report found that it is impossible, on this small island with a population of 56 million people, for all those people to exercise their right to use a motor car as and when they see fit because the freedom they wish to exercise is impossible to achieve. The more people believe that they can simply drive wherever they want, whenever they want, the less likely their chance of doing so because the motorways will seize up. That point is central to the Government's transport and roads policy. We cannot assume that we can continue to exercise our personal freedom indefinitely. We all have a responsibility to understand that point and to take action.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport referred to a remark made by the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) about the hypocrisy in the Conservative party of those who argue that, on the one hand, they support its policy, and that of the Government, of reducing carbon dioxide emissions to meet the Kyoto targets, but that on the other hand, they oppose the fuel duty escalator and other restrictions on private motoring.

I would not mind if Tory Members said that they were opposed to the Kyoto protocol and they supported people's right to drive their cars whenever they want. That, at least, would be consistent. It is not intellectually consistent for them to say that they support environmental measures and are all in favour of cutting carbon dioxide emissions, but that they want to do nothing about that in their roads policy. That goes further than hypocrisy; it is schizophrenia. The division in the Conservative party between those who profess to support the environment and those who are simply mouthpieces for the road haulage lobby is growing by the day. It is equally as great as the Conservatives' divisions on Europe, and sooner or later, it will cause an equally serious crisis in the party.

My second point concerns my constituency. If I may, I will tell a brief story. Thirty years ago, a railway line connected Bury to the smaller towns to the north and to the Rossendale valley even further to the north. Thanks to Lord Beeching, that line was closed, and a few years later, a large motorway, the M66, was constructed. After that, areas of land adjacent to the motorway were developed for housing. Thousands of new houses were constructed, and many of them attracted two-car families. Shortly after its construction, therefore, the M66 became clogged up with traffic. What an indictment of our transport policy it is that over 30 years, we shut down the railway system, built roads, put new houses next to them and clogged them up with cars. The people who wanted to get out to work in the conurbation further to the south were simply unable to do so.

My final point concerns the fuel duty escalator. I referred in an earlier intervention to the recent research available in the Library which proves conclusively that the fuel duty escalator is fair, effective and workable. It proves conclusively that it does not damage the interests of low-income households in rural areas, because the lowest-income households do not have cars. It proves conclusively that the policy shifts the balance of taxation from those who can least afford to pay to those who can well afford to pay.

Mr. David Faber (Westbury): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a brief contribution late in this debate, not least because it saves me from having to instigate, at a later stage, an Adjournment debate on a road in my constituency.

First, I strongly associate myself with the earlier remarks of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the previous Conservative Government's record on building bypasses and the effects of this Government's policies on the road haulage industry. I am proud to have successful members of that industry in my constituency, one of whom I spoke to this morning, when he described the Government's current Budget plans for the industry as idiotic.

My colleagues have referred also to the slashing of the roads budget. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) that the Government have misunderstood the problems of people in rural areas, especially poorer areas, and their dependency on their car to take their children to school, go to work and do the weekly shop.

In his opening speech, the Minister of Transport said that he hoped that hon. Members who had individual constituency cases would write to him rather than raising them in the debate. I am happy to say that hon. Members on both sides of the House have ignored his strictures. They were right to do so if, like me, they have been trying to contact Ministers for the past six months by post, through speeches in the House or by invitations to the constituency. I know what a forlorn hope that can be.

I make no apology for mentioning a road in my constituency that illustrates the grave problems that the Government will face on detrunking. In July last year, the Government issued their paper, "A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England", which, referring to the south-west, said:

> "A number of smaller scale but badly needed measures are under way or planned in the South West which address safety or capacity problems at particular points on the trunk road network. They will proceed regardless of the outcome of studies affecting the roads."

The A36, which runs through my constituency, is a main regional road. It runs from Southampton on the south coast to join the A46 at Bath, and on into Wales and the midlands. It is a vital inter-regional link which carries huge amounts of heavy traffic. I am especially concerned with one small link: the Codford to Heytesbury bypass, which is considered by local police to be the most dangerous part of the A36.

On several occasions under the previous Government, I took representatives from local parish councils to see the Minister of Transport's predecessor, John Watts. By the general election, it had been agreed that a design, build, finance and operate project would go ahead, and it was almost certainly at the top of the council's priorities. Designs had been submitted and bids were prepared, but in July came the bombshell that this main regional route was to be detrunked, and that not only would the scheme be cancelled, but the road would no longer be central Government's responsibility.

The width of the small link is the same as it was when it was built as a turnpike in the 19th century. The narrowness causes frequent blockages, and the junctions and bends are lethal. One junction on the brow of a hill is a constant source of accidents, but the most dangerous stretch is the turning out of the village of Upton Lovell—a blind bend that the police acknowledge is the most dangerous on the road between Southampton and Bath, and which I, like the locals, refuse to use. We all prefer to drive several miles through other villages in order to gain access to the main road.

I am sorry to say that the stretch of road has been the scene of tragic accidents. In 1991, 16-year-old Matthew Armes was killed when he was hit by a car while sitting on his bicycle outside his front door. I have stood with his mother at the very spot where he sadly died. A second cyclist, Mr. Terry, was killed on the same stretch of road in the same year. A year later, there were three accidents in a fortnight just near the spot where Matthew died. This year, there has already been one fatal accident on that stretch of road. Two days before that, a child was critically injured in a crash at the junction on the brow of the hill to which I referred.

All this may sound like a purely local issue, but I make no apology for raising it because road safety and the wider issue of detrunking is important. Local people are horrified that, by detrunking the road, the Government are effectively washing their hands of the problem. Worse still, although county councils have always been compensated for taking responsibility for roads following detrunking, Wiltshire county council has been told informally that there is to be no compensation.

The hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ) made great play of how her county council was happy with its negotiations with central Government, yet Wiltshire county council has still not been told whether the road is to be detrunked, when it is to be detrunked and whether there will be any compensation. The Under-Secretary is shrugging her shoulders.

Ms Glenda Jackson: I do not understand what the hon. Gentleman is attempting to elicit. I understood him to say that the road had been detrunked and that there would be no compensation. Detrunked roads for which a local authority has asked will lose no status. There will be fair funding to ensure their life-long maintenance. Such matters are on-going between the Highways Agency and local authorities.

Mr. Faber: With respect, life-long maintenance is not the same as improving a stretch of road which the local police have acknowledged is the most dangerous in the region.

I am aware that other hon. Members want to participate, so I shall leave the Under-Secretary and the Minister of Transport, who I am glad to see is back in his place, with the issue. Perhaps I can at least secure an undertaking this evening that the Under-Secretary's officials will contact the county council to explain the true status of the road and that, if the road is to be detrunked, they will work with the county council to ensure that compensation is paid. Perhaps, too, all records on that stretch of road that are held by the Highways Agency will be made available to the county council.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak briefly in this debate. Several issues have already been raised, so I shall not repeat them.

One of the most striking features of the debate has been the U-turn of Opposition Members—and not only on the number of roads that they want in the roads programme. We knew that that number started at 500 back in 1990, and that it fell to 150 by 1997, but from the way in which they have spoken in this debate, one would think that they wanted to throw in another couple of hundred for good measure.

Not only has there been a U-turn on that but, more interestingly—despite the fact that, in 1994, the Conservative Government increased diesel duty by 13 per cent.—Conservative Members have said that they actually want to cut diesel duty. They therefore have a responsibility to say how they intend to raise the millions of pounds of revenue for vital public services that that duty generates. There will be some interesting things for us to consider in tomorrow's Hansard.

I believe that the Government's strategy is more realistic about tackling congestion, is realistic in the sense of prioritising infrastructure investment where necessary, and focuses on the necessary integrated public transport strategy that has been missing for so long. The extra funding for transport—£1.7 billion in the next three years—is extremely welcome, providing new opportunities to reduce congestion. It will also help to move people out of cars and into more effective methods of public transport.

The Chancellor announced many things in his Budget. One of the announcements for which my constituents were most grateful was that relating to the capital modernisation fund. That will double infrastructural investment across all public services during the life of this Parliament, and it highlights the many ways in which transport infrastructure investment will benefit.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport said that the Highways Agency was being refocused on better maintenance, the more effective use of existing road space, and a greater emphasis on the environment and road safety. The legacy left by the Conservative party was one of individual car growth spiralling out of control, pollution and an unfortunate increase in the number of road casualties. At last—it is about time—we have a Government who are tackling these things at a comprehensive strategic level.

Most importantly, I want to take the opportunity to say thank you once again to my right hon. and hon. Friends for their approval of the A650 Bingley relief road. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hurrah."] I am glad to hear hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber greet that announcement with such acclaim. I was bowled over with excitement when the announcement was made. I am so proud that, after 27 years of my short life and a 35-year wait by my constituents, a £60 million, 5 km stretch of dual carriageway is being prioritised. Work is scheduled to start in 2001–02. That is an extremely welcome announcement, and contrasts with the failure of the Conservative party ever to get things under way.

The road will increase accessibility to the local town centre and help the local economy, enabling businesses to move about more easily instead of being stuck in congestion. It is a cost-effective scheme and it will do a tremendous amount to regenerate Bingley town centre. Apart from the generally improved environment that will result, pollution will reduce significantly as decreased congestion causes emissions of smoke and particulates from vehicles to fall.

On road safety, I hope that the average of 35 casualties that have taken place in Bingley each year will be almost eliminated because roads and pedestrians will be separated. That is a very important point.

I have taken the liberty of setting up a working group in my constituency to consider how we may use the Bingley relief road go-ahead to benefit integrated public transport development. I have brought together a local Railtrack representative and representatives of the Northern Spirit train company, First Bradford bus company, Keighley district bus company and several user groups to see how we can use the free thoroughfare that we shall have on the Bingley main street to further public transport development.

I am delighted that this relief road will create enormous potential for my constituents in public transport. I am very proud of the Minister. I repeat that my constituents are extremely pleased, delighted and happy with the Government's road policy.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): The policy of the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) seems to be that there should be new roads for Shipley, but not for anywhere else. We do not regard that as a satisfactory policy. I should point out to the hon. Gentleman that we voted against the diesel duty increases in the Budget, so there was no U-turn today. Indeed, we voted against the diesel duty increases in the previous Budget. The hon. Gentleman should read Hansard.

The Prime Minister said that he wants Europe to be more like America. The price per litre of unleaded petrol is 67.89p in the UK, whereas in the US it is 15.9p. There is rather a big gap between the Prime Minister's rhetoric and the reality.

I particularly enjoyed the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), who made a strong case for a substantial programme of trunk road and motorway renewals and improvements. He rightly pointed out that the 400 schemes that we produced over 18 years are not matched by the mere 37 schemes that the Government propose over seven years.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) could not say whether he thought that the building of the M25 was a mistake, which rather sums up Liberal Democrat policy. He mentioned the subject of traffic growth. We are against the increase in congestion and pollution which has been caused by the Government's policies.

Mr. Baker rose—

Mr. Jenkin: I will not give way, as I am short of time.

I thank my colleagues and the Labour Members who contributed to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) mentioned the Wyre Piddle bypass and the problems at Bordersley.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) was absolutely right again about the escalator. We introduced the escalator with the intention not that it should go on for ever, but that, when we got to the top, we should get off.

It is utter cant for the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) to justify the tax increases in terms of the environmental policy. We have met our Kyoto targets. He is promoting coal-fired power stations, instead of cleaner gas-fired power stations. Coal-fired power stations contribute far more to environmental pollution than cars. Petrol duty increases will contribute virtually nothing towards reduced CO_2 emissions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Faber) made a moving speech. His concerns about the detrunking of the A36 and A46 are significant, and I am sure that the Minister of Transport took them on board. My hon. Friend's comments reflect the fact that the roads programme is a matter of life or death.

We all enjoyed the speech by the Minister of Transport, possibly more than he did. We must be fair to him—he has inherited a mess that is not entirely his fault. [Interruption.] His colleagues have landed him in it because of the commitments that they have made and the cuts that he has been landed with. We were stirred by his loyalty to his boss. Perhaps he will pass on our apologies if his boss bursts into tears as a result of the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard).

We welcome the Minister's announcement about the A130, which is a tribute to our skills as an Opposition in calling for the debate. I also welcome the Minister's endorsement of the Streetworks Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser).

The Minister complained about the accident statistics that he inherited from the previous Government. The statistics are better than those of any European country, by miles. That shows that he was scraping the bottom of the barrel.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) rose—

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me for not giving way, but I have very little time.

Transport taxation has rocketed under the Government. As the House of Commons Library confirms, the Government will raise an extra £9 billion in fuel duties over the lifetime of this Parliament, over and above what was planned by the Conservatives. However, new taxes on motoring and the motorist do not end there.

In the most recent Budget alone, there is an extra £270 million from company car drivers. There are extra taxes on business, especially small businesses, through the increase in national insurance for the self-employed. There is the punitive vehicle excise duty rate on 40 and 41 tonne trucks, which is more than 11 times higher than the equivalent rate in other EU countries.

All that compounds the overwhelming impression that the Government do not begin to understand the circumstances of the road haulage sector. The industry is manifestly in a state of crisis, yet the Budget piles on even more pain and taxes.

People's livelihoods are being destroyed and 50,000 jobs are set to go. This is all the more evident now than it was before the Budget, yet, to the Freight Transport Association, the Minister of Transport could only say:

"While it is a problem, it is hardly the massive one that it's made out to be. I'm convinced that you don't suffer from any serious disadvantage."

What planet is he living on? Now the Prime Minister acknowledges the problem. In the House yesterday, he said:

"I certainly understand the problems of the road haulage industry as it has set them out."—[Official Report, 17 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 1120.]

What happened between the Freight Transport Association's conference and the Prime Minister's statement yesterday? It happens to be the Budget. Yet, as though in mitigation, the Prime Minister has the gall to add that he has now given a £400 million subsidy in low-sulphur fuel discounts. A subsidy—is he serious? Has he forgotten that the Budget has just increased the duty on ultra low-sulphur diesel by 9.82 per cent? Yet he calls it a subsidy. He has just clobbered the road haulage industry with a massive tax increase and he insults the industry that is underwriting his increases in public spending by claiming that it is receiving a subsidy.

That blindness is matched only by the comments of the Minister for Transport in London, speaking just after the Budget, when she said:

"many foreign hauliers . . . are now moving to the United Kingdom and using it as a base for their operations."

[Mr. Jenkin]

She added:

"We perceive haulage firms from mainland Europe moving their operations into this country."—[Official Report, European Standing Committee A, 10 March 1999; c. 8-9.]

She can only mean that they are coming here with foreign registered trucks, burning cheap foreign fuel to mop up the UK competition.

To add further insult to injury, speaking to the Freight Transport Association conference, the Minister of Transport said:

"I have never met a businessman yet who goes out of business and says it is his fault."

How out of touch can the right hon. Gentleman be?

From the reports of Downing street briefings today, and for all the Prime Minister's supple body language, we know that the Government are still in complete denial about the catastrophe that the haulage industry faces. No wonder there will be a demonstration of the industry's despair in London. The chaos will be the fault of the right hon. Gentleman and his Government. He would do well to say this evening that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will agree to see representatives of the road haulage industry for the first time, because that might do something to diffuse the crisis.

Dr. Reid: In view of the hon. Gentleman's commendation of that demonstration, will he stop his weasel words, get up on his two feet, and tell us whether he supports the demonstration that is to take place on Monday which will disrupt and inconvenience London?

Mr. Jenkin: Of course I do not support the demonstration. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the truckers have been driven to this despair by the Government's policies. He would do well to acknowledge the destruction that his policies wreak. Where is all the money going? It is not going on transport, because transport spending is falling. The previous Conservative Government, in their last year in office, spent £4.9 billion on transport, and were planning to spend £5.2 billion in 1997-98. The comprehensive spending review shows that the Government are spending only £4.7 billion this year, falling to £4.6 billion next year, and falling further to £4.5 billion the year after that.

On trunk road and motorway improvements, the Conservative Government spent £1 billion a year between 1994–95 and 1996–97. The Government will spend only £300 million a year between 1999 and 2002. Spending on local road improvement schemes will increase next year by a paltry £1 million to £624 million—a cut in real terms. As my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk described, the backlog of repairs is getting even worse. No—for all the glossy brochures and reannounced initiatives, the Government's priority is not transport. The reason why motorists must pay tax of £8.50 out of every £10 spent at the petrol pump is to pay for the Government's profligacy and incompetence in other departments.

The Government have increased—

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): What about the money for the health service?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman talks about the health service, but the Government have increased social security spending—tax credit spending—by £38.4 billion and are squandering billions of pounds on the so-called new deal for the unemployed, ignorant of the fact that their other policies are throwing people straight back on the dole.

Two years into the Parliament, we have only endless consultation and not a single transport Bill. Britain needs a Government who can think creatively about solving Britain's transport problems. Labour inherited creative thinking from the Conservatives—for example, a £20 billion investment programme for the railways—and that is how we transformed so many state-owned transport industries.

We provided the new ideas in the past, and the Conservatives will have to provide the new ideas in the future, to get Britain moving again. Two years ago, Labour promised an integrated transport policy, but it is delivering a standstill Britain.

6.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) made his only salient point at the beginning of his contribution: he confessed, albeit without apology, that the Government inherited a mess in respect of road and rail transport because of the previous Government's total failure even to begin to consider what is central to our policies—an integrated transport strategy.

An integrated transport strategy was supported by my hon. Friends the Members for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ), for Castle Point (Mrs. Butler), for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) and for Shipley (Mr. Leslie). Each and every one of them could detail to the House how the Government are improving the lives of their constituents by introducing policies and funds to create integrated transport strategies. Those strategies relieve overdependence on the private car and play their part in reducing not only congestion, but pollution.

Every contribution made from the Conservative Benches was fascinating, because the Conservative party is doing a major U-turn on every transport policy that it inflicted on this country for 18 years.

Mr. Faber: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Jackson: No, I am afraid that I am almost out of time.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) made a particularly interesting contribution. Apparently, he managed to obtain 13 bypasses for his constituency, but he complains that he needs another two. If I remember rightly, he agreed that we had to move away from what had been Conservative party policy—predict and provide—because putting more and more tarmac on our roads does nothing but encourage more car journeys.

The right hon. Gentleman's contribution was also interesting because he wants to introduce motorway tolls, which I understand is not Conservative party policy, although we know that the Conservatives would introduce congestion charging. However, they would never, ever hypothecate the sums so raised to the improvement of transport, which is our policy in respect of the Greater London authority. [Interruption.] It is in the Bill.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) somewhat ungraciously neglected to accord to the Government credit for the help that they gave to the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Dafis) when he took his Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Bill through the House. The hon. Gentleman asked particular questions; no, of course I cannot guarantee that there will be the reduction in traffic about which he spoke by the end of this Parliament. As my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport made clear in his opening remarks, changing direction is like manoeuvring a supertanker, which cannot be turned on a sixpence. However, our commitment to achieving not only a reduction in road traffic, but an absolute reduction, stands firm.

Two central themes emanated from the contributions of Conservative Members: their unwillingness to acknowledge that they introduced the fuel duty escalator and their inability to accept that the major rises in the escalator occurred under the previous Administration, as we have had occasion to say. The price of DERV has risen by 7p since May 1997; under the previous Government, it rose by 26p.

Conservative Members also made much of the fact that they put funding into trunk road maintenance and local road schemes. This Government have increased funding for local road maintenance to almost £2 billion—the figure was frozen for four years by the previous Administration—and there is almost £250,000 in additional funding for the bridge programme. We have given a clear commitment on the 37 road schemes which we announced, with a budget of £1.4 billion. The figures for trunk road maintenance are £651 million for 1998–99 and £780 million for 2001–02, and there has been an additional £550 million for making better use of our roads.

Conservative Members were much concerned about what they claimed was an unbearable burden on our freight industry. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport will meet representatives of the haulage industry. Conservative Members do no favours to the companies in their constituencies if they do not point out to those hauliers the facts of the case. If hauliers moved to the continent, the real burden would be the infinitely higher rates of corporation tax—the United Kingdom has the lowest—and infinitely higher social costs on the mainland of Europe.

Mr. Paterson: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Jackson: No.

The net differential with haulage companies in France has been estimated at almost £450,000 in France, almost £600,000 in the Netherlands, and more than £800,000 in Belgium. If Conservative Members are seriously committed to their constituents and are really concerned about retaining jobs in their areas, they should give the industry the facts, as my right hon. Friend most certainly will.

Another issue which was raised by more than one hon. Member was detrunking. The hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Faber) spoke of a particularly tragic incident in his constituency on the road that is proposed for detrunking. Detrunking does not mean a reduction in status, and discussions are continuing between the local authorities and my Department. Nor does it mean that there will be inadequate funds to maintain such roads throughout their lifetime. I hope that that will reassure the hon. Gentleman.

My hon. Friends made many valid points on safety. The Government are committed to ensuring that our roads are safe. We want there to be a shift and we want to offer real choices for travel, so that we begin to reduce the dangers on our roads. Conservative Members would apparently abolish the fuel duty escalator. They have clearly given up any commitment to meeting the environmental targets of Kyoto. [Interruption.] They have washed their hands of taking any steps to improve our environment and to reduce congestion on our roads. They would go back to the old predict and provide strategy on road building. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. There is far too much noise in the Chamber.

Ms Jackson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Conservative Members shed crocodile tears about what they regard as the horrendous impact on rural communities of the fuel duty escalator. The Conservative Government pillaged rural communities. They took away roads, jobs, houses, health care, village shops and village schools. Now, suddenly, Conservative Members are caring, but what was significantly missing from their contributions was any mention of the 30 per cent. of people in this country who have no access to private transport. Where would those people be now if Conservative policies had continued?

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question accordingly put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House commends the Government for taking a far-sighted and more integrated approach to roads policy than the previous administration; notes that the previous Government's 'predict and provide' approach to road building has been discredited and that the present Government has instead taken a realistic and practical approach based on the five criteria of integration, the economy, the environment, safety and accessibility; notes further that the previous Conservative Government's grandiose but impractical wish-list of schemes for which funding was not available has been replaced by a targeted programme of improvements, all of which can be started within seven years; welcomes its increased and more rationally-based spending on roads maintenance; and applauds the Government for tackling the problems of congestion and pollution, thereby ensuring that the road transport system operates for the benefit of individual people and the UK economy as a whole.

It being after Seven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the Questions relating to Estimates which he was directed to put at that hour, pursuant to Standing Order No. 55 (Questions on voting of estimates, &c.) and the Order [16 December].

Arts Funding (Westminster)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hill.]

7.28 pm

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North): London is home to a flourishing and diverse artistic community. We are truly fortunate in that we host centres of excellence in the performing and fine arts that draw on a magnificent heritage going back for centuries. However, the arts are not only a heritage from the past. We also have a thriving modern cultural sector that reaches into new mediums of delivery and celebrates our dynamic multicultural present.

Culture and the arts are not an optional add-on for a society that has resources to spare. They give expression to our humanity, enrich our lives, stimulate the imaginations of our children and act as a barometer of our self-esteem. We should be proud of what we do to promote the arts in our society and cautious of those who see the arts as a frivolity or as one more consumer good to be left to the market to deliver.

Fifteen months ago, I was delighted to attend a celebration of the arts in Westminster at the London Palladium, set up by Westminster city council. Westminster's gala nights for the arts were grounds for pride on the part of the council. They showcased the enthusiasm and talent among our schoolchildren and youth in music, dance, drama and the carnival arts. They demonstrated the dynamic that exists when the artistic traditions of China, Bangladesh, the Caribbean and the many countries whence our asylum seekers come meet modern Britain's world of classical, rap and rock music.

My purpose in seeking this debate tonight is to give expression to the profound disappointment I now feel at Westminster city council's decision to slash funding for the arts and community groups in central London. That disappointment is all the more acute because it contrasts with the positive support and statements of support given by the borough up to and including its recent gala nights for the arts.

Only a few months ago, Councillor Harvey Marshall, chair of the arts committee, said:

"Westminster is certainly the capital and it must be the heart of the arts in London and the country. We shall continue to support the arts at all levels, for the benefit of residents, businesses and visitors."

At the beginning of last month, the council cut its funding to all but one of the 24 arts organisations that it had supported. Cuts ranged from 6 per cent. to the complete loss of grant. Decisions came out of the blue for many groups, and they were taken in a thoughtless, blustering manner that made a mockery of the pious words of Councillor Marshall just weeks earlier.

Out went the grants to the orchestra of St. John's, Smith square. Out went the grant to the Photographers Gallery. The Yaa Asentewa centre lost four fifths of its grant, and it is struggling for its life. That organisation may need to make changes in the services that it delivers, but I must wonder about the message being sent to black Londoners by the loss of support for the only Londonwide black arts centre.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): My hon. Friend will recall that I was a Westminster councillor in my previous life. For 10 years, I was opposition spokesperson on the arts committee, where, on what was otherwise a highly politically polarised council, we were able to achieve a great deal of consensus because of the chairmanship of the then Councillor Roger Bramble, a great supporter of Yaa Asentewa and some of the more avant-garde arts. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is particularly demeaning that, now that Roger Bramble has moved on, Westminster is taking a much more right-wing approach towards the arts? The situation at Yaa Asentewa illustrates the way in which Westminster is targeting arts that support the ethnic minorities. In addition, the council is targeting the avant-garde arts organisations—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I am afraid that I must interrupt the hon. Gentleman.

Ms Buck: I am grateful to my hon. Friend who is completely right.

I need not explain to the Minister the importance of carnival in my constituency. The Yaa Asentewa is among the centres at which carnival arts are nurtured and promoted. They are of great significance, particularly to Afro-Caribbean residents.

The most recent edition of the bulletin, "The Arts in Westminster", advertises the fact that the Yaa Asentewa has been funded by the local single regeneration budget to run a holiday play scheme and an after-school club involving drama and music skills as well as basic skills tuition in literacy and numeracy.

Cuts have also fallen on the Serpentine gallery, the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, the English National Opera and Ballet, Paddington Arts, Wigmore hall, Photo Works Westminster, the Soho Theatre Company, London Print Workshop, the Institute of Contemporary Arts, Westminster Youth Dance Scene, Alternative Arts—which was singled out for praise by Councillor Marshall just weeks earlier—and more.

In all, £360,000 has been cut from arts organisations. That has been partially offset by some small additional funding, but 15 per cent. of the arts budget—£230,000—has been lost to the arts in the borough. I should like to deal briefly with the borough's arguments in justification of that action.

Westminster claims that the Government have cut support to the borough. Yet the December policy and resources budget paper admitted that the grant settlement meant that "the position for next year is better than expected".

Since then, the council has received additional money for education and several other additional special grants. As standard spending assessments have been agreed for a three-year cycle, there is no justification for panic spending cuts.

Westminster has long been, and remains, one of those authorities that raise the smallest proportion of spending from the council tax. Only £1 in every £10 spent by the council comes from the council tax payer—a proportion virtually unchanged since 1995. As a percentage of budget, Westminster's council tax requirement was the fourth lowest in the country in 1997, and the fifth lowest last year. Those figures give the lie to claims that the Government have been excessively punitive towards Westminster and that council tax payers bear too much of the spending burden.

I cannot fail to mention the fact that Westminster is sitting on reserves of £84 million.

The council also ignores the fact that Westminster, which has the highest concentration of arts organisations in the country, benefits from inward investment because of its support for the arts. Westminster's local economy benefits from tourism and visitors, half of whom cite the arts as a reason for their visit. The London Arts Board invests £2 million in arts provision in Westminster, and the city is also a major recipient of lottery arts funding. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond to that point in his reply, as it will help to disabuse us of the notion that local council tax payers are subsidising national organisations from which they receive no benefit.

The other important counter-argument to the charges laid by Westminster lie in our schools. Many of the institutions savaged by grant cuts have an excellent record of work with school children. Wigmore hall states:

"The £8,000 cut in funding restricts the Hall's ability to fund an education officer . . . our schools projects complement the national curriculum and to date they are offered almost exclusively to schools within Westminster. As the city does not have a Music Co-ordinator, the Hall arranged for teachers to meet regularly to share ideas and good teaching practice . . . the relationship developed and Wigmore Hall raised funds to employ an administrator to arrange inter-school activities and a pool of musical instruments."

The Institute of Contemporary Arts has listed educational initiatives that will have to be scaled down, including a consultancy scheme on the deeply and multiply deprived Mozart estate, developing teaching and learning materials with teachers and community groups and organising evening taster sessions for residents. The Photographers Gallery drew attention to recent community projects that involved working with the Marylebone Bangladeshi society, Soho parish school, deaf artists from the area and others. The Serpentine gallery warns that a 48 per cent. cut will "have a serious impact on the Gallery's education programme and the service it can offer to residents . . . half the children who attend the Saturday Art Club are Westminster children and they have priority . . . these activities and policies are now in jeopardy."

In conclusion, I should like to raise three points. First, Westminster is wrong to make damaging, philistine and financially devastating cuts to arts and community organisations. Secondly, it is repugnant to attempt to pin the blame on the cost of asylum seekers to the local community.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I know the subject to which the hon. Lady is turning. Does she agree that that was a coda to the central problem, which is that the Government had decided to take millions out of Westminster's budget in respect of people who come in for the day as visitors? The figures for several of the institutions that she has mentioned show that, to a great extent, they service people from outside Westminster, rather than purely Westminster people.

Ms Buck: I have attempted to make it clear that the funding Westminster gives to community organisations is directed to the benefit of local residents and school children, and funds projects involving work with local schools and community groups, so it is not right to make the allegation that the right hon. Gentleman makes.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's point about cuts in funding to the borough in previous years, he is absolutely correct to say that a charge was made to the spending formula in 1997. Westminster objected to that; the council sought and was not refused leave to have a judicial review of that decision. However, that decision was taken in 1997, and the local elections were fought in 1998, after the decision had already been incorporated into the Budget. The manifesto did not say a word about the fact that the council would seek another round of cuts—indeed, the council prided itself on the fact that, thanks to its good housekeeping, it was able to sustain front-line services and maintain a low council tax. However, immediately after the local elections, an axe was taken to community, voluntary and arts organisations.

To return to the point about asylum seekers, I want to express my anger about the fact that some extremely vulnerable people who have arrived in this country are being blamed for the crisis in arts funding. Although in recent years many London councils have borne too large a part of the financial burden for a matter that should be dealt with at national level, Westminster council knows full well that the new Government are taking several measures to assist central London boroughs, including Westminster, with the cost of asylum seekers. Those measures include an additional £130 million grant to help London boroughs, which was announced before Christmas. The combination of proposals to assist other communities to take a fair share of asylum seekers and the additional money means that it is completely wrong to attempt to pin the blame on asylum seekers. I believe that was a cynical and provocative playing of the race card for which there is no excuse.

The arts and community groups deserve nothing but praise for the work that they do, and have done, in Westminster and for the campaign of persuasion that they have run in recent months in an attempt to influence the council to change its decision. The London Arts Board and the National Campaign for the Arts should also be commended for their vigorous support at this difficult time. The arts will survive in Westminster because our communities and our institutions are strong, but much damage has been done to both morale and vital services.

I know that the Minister cannot write me a cheque—although, if he did, I would certainly not tear it up. However, I would be grateful for a sign that he and the Government recognise the value of the arts in the deprived, multicultural Westminster community and that he shares my regret about the damage being done to arts institutions.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Alan Howarth): As is her way, my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) has done a service to Londoners and to us all by securing this debate. I am grateful to her for raising the issue of funding for the arts in Westminster, and for speaking with such vigour and strength of feeling.

I want to place the problems with which the arts have been confronted in Westminster in the context of this Government's policy for the arts. To us, it is a central and welcome responsibility of Government to support the arts. The arts are integral to the quality of our lives, private and public. For the experience of the arts to be accessible to all people, there is an inescapable obligation on Government to act to bring that about. It is a responsibility that falls on both central and local government.

We have been willing to find the money that the arts need. The settlement we achieved in the comprehensive spending review will put an extra £125 million into the arts over the next three years—the largest increase for a generation at least, and is in stark contrast to the recent history of arts funding in this country. In announcing my Department's funding plans for the next three years, we intend that the Arts Council and the bodies it funds should have greater certainty over the coming period and an unprecedented opportunity to plan strategically.

Beyond money, we are working to create an environment in which the arts can thrive and satisfy audiences across the country. We want access, as I have said, to ensure that the arts are for the many, not the few. We want excellence, because we believe in it for its own sake. We want education, so that people's enjoyment of the arts is enhanced and because that is our investment in the long-term future of the arts and in the quality of life of our society. We want a healthy arts economy, because it underwrites the rest of our objectives and provides jobs. In the United Kingdom, the creative industries have been growing at about twice the rate of the economy as a whole. They already employ more than 1.4 million people—5 per cent. of the total employed work force.

All those principles will be enshrined in the funding agreement we are currently preparing with the Arts Council. We are investing on the condition that the recipients of public investment—our partners—share our commitment to excellence and innovation, access for all, education and the creative economy. We believe that the administration of funding for the arts should be cost effective. Accordingly, the Arts Council is restructuring to deliver a better service to arts practitioners. It will be a leaner, more effective organisation. Many of its current responsibilities will be delegated in future to the regional arts boards, bringing funding decisions closer to the people most affected.

I am happy to be able to tell the House that, in the coming year, the Arts Council and the London Arts Board between them will invest £36 million in Westminster. Like my hon. Friend, however, I am very unhappy about the view that Westminster has taken of its own responsibilities in the coming year.

Our system of public support for the arts will work as it should only if everyone plays a part. Responsibility must be shared between the Arts Council—in distributing grant-in-aid and lottery funds—the regional arts boards, local authorities and other funders, such as business sponsors and the European Union. One partner cannot retreat in the expectation that others will pick up the tab. Our artistic ecology is fragile. The confluence of funding streams that keeps many precious artistic enterprises afloat is finely balanced: damming just one tributary can be enough to leave them high and dry.

My hon. Friend will understand that, as Minister for the Arts, I cannot and do not wish to determine local priorities in Westminster or any other authority. If the arm's length principle applies to the way in which the Arts Council and regional arts boards distribute grant-in-aid, it must also apply to local government spending on the arts. The accountability of Westminster city council is to its electors. If the people of Westminster do not believe that their council is getting its priorities right, they can seek to persuade their locally elected representatives to take a different course of action. They can also express their dissatisfaction through the ballot box.

It has already become clear that cutting funding to arts organisations is not a soft option for a local authority. When damage is gratuitously inflicted on the cultural life of an area, there is a public outcry, both from the artistic community and from local people. So it has been in the case raised by my hon. Friend. Her voice and mine are but additions to the many who have criticised the actions of Westminster city council.

Trevor Phillips, chair of the London Arts Board, has written eloquently in the Evening Standard of Westminster's lamentable decision, of the joyless, miserable and depressing vision of the chairman of Westminster city council's arts committee, Councillor Harvey Marshall, and of the ugly whiff of bigotry that he detects. Peter Hewitt, chief executive of the Arts Council, has said that he is deeply disappointed by Westminster's actions. The Evening Standard itself, in an editorial, has described Westminster's decision to cut arts funding as one that smacks of Philistinism and narrow-mindedness, and has deplored the damage that Westminster will do to the education of its children.

I can only agree. Westminster's cuts to arts funding will do damage to arts organisations of high reputation. To name but a few of the hardest hit, we are talking about, as my hon. Friend told us, the orchestra of St. John's Smith Square, the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, the Photographers' gallery and the Institute of Contemporary Arts. Another is the Serpentine gallery. Westminster's grant to the gallery is spent on education, but it will now be reduced from £58,000 to £28,000. Last year, more than 500 teachers, mostly from Westminster, attended workshops run by the gallery. The gallery runs regular events for three local primary schools. Disabled people attended 12 similar events. The reduction in funding can have only the most serious implications for all those activities.

That is happening in the heart of our capital city, which is one of the world's great capitals of the arts, attracting artists and performers from within and beyond our shores. London's audiences create the opportunities for London's performers; they treasure and insist upon the public support that is indispensable to the vitality and quality of the arts in London.

The particular organisations that I have mentioned will have to bear reductions of between 47 and 100 per cent. in their local authority funding. For smaller organisations, cuts of that order can have a devastating, if not terminal, effect. For their larger colleagues, they are still deeply undermining. Twenty-three arts organisations in Westminster are to suffer. Those that will bear lesser cuts to their funding will still be damaged.

As in the case of the Serpentine gallery, to which I have already referred, so too with Wigmore hall—my hon. Friend described the damage to its educational programme—the Institute of Contemporary Arts, the Photographers' gallery and other organisations, where Westminster's dereliction will hit the activities that put most back into the community, such as arts education. Dr. Nicholas Tate, the chief executive of the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority has said:

> "It has become very clear to us how powerful is the contribution of the arts to a whole range of skills and attitudes that are vital to learning right across the curriculum, and indeed to employability."

Westminster's schools face many difficulties and challenges. The arts offer to schoolchildren, not just the high fliers but those who are disaffected and see too little prospect for themselves in formal education, a kindling of the imagination and opportunities for personal development, which we should grasp and not reject. It is not some social elite that suffers when the arts are cut, but people—adults and children—who might otherwise have little or no opportunity to experience what the arts have to offer.

The harm done to individual organisations aggregates into a bleaker picture overall. A community in which those in authority care about its culture, reflecting the values of the people whom they represent, has depth and substance. It has pride and it presents itself proudly to the world. The damage that the authority may do to itself through a cut of £360,000 in investment in arts organisations in the city of Westminster, through discouraging tourists, investors and employers, not to mention the detrimental impact on education, is incalculable.

When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State negotiated the substantial increase in arts funding during the comprehensive spending review, he did not do so with the intention of filling, in retrospect, the gaps left by local authorities. When we see the Arts Council offering the Serpentine gallery an increased grant of £80,000 in the coming year, while Westminster city council withdraws £58,000; when we see the London Arts Board upping funding to the Unicorn children's theatre by £8,000, while Westminster withdraws £17,000; when we see the way in which funds channelled through my Department are negated by cuts by Westminster, we feel a sense of betrayal.

We all know that when a local authority sets its budget, some hard choices are inevitable. There are many competing demands for funding, of course. From time to time, funders of arts budgets need to alter patterns of support—perhaps because the management or the artistic output of an organisation is not what it needs to be. But, as my hon. Friends the Members for Regent's Park and Kensington, North and for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) have made clear, there is no persuasive rationale for what is planned by Westminster. It intends to cut the funding of the organisations I have listed by nearly 30 per cent. for no decent reason.

The chairman of Westminster's arts committee, Councillor Harvey Marshall, has stated that one reason for the cuts is a reduction in central Government support for the council. The right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) also made that point. I will give the House the facts. The standard spending assessment for Westminster city council—the pot from which arts funding is drawn—has risen by 5.2 per cent. compared with 1998–99. That compares with an average increase for inner London of 4.2 per cent. Overall, the total external support for Westminster will rise from £187.72 million to £192.74 million in the coming year.

I turn to the most extremely offensive aspect of what Westminster has done. As my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North told us, Councillor Marshall has stated his view that cuts in the arts are necessary to pay for asylum seekers in the borough. Again, I will set out the facts. Westminster has by no means the largest task among the London boroughs in dealing with the number of asylum seekers needing support. Moreover, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already responded to pleas from local authorities for more assistance, making an extra £30 million available to support new arrangements for asylum seekers, focusing on London and Dover in particular. Local authorities will be able to recover from Government the costs which fall to them of accommodating and supporting asylum seekers. Those steps have been welcomed by both the Association of London Government and the Local Government Association.

Councillor Harvey Marshall proposes an equation—more asylum seekers equals less art for Londoners—which should shame the local authority whose arts committee he chairs. The politics of making scapegoats is ugly, nasty and unacceptable. My hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North expressed her anger about that. The right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster offered a plea in mitigation, but it will not suffice. He is a thoroughly decent man, and must be as ashamed as any of us of what his Conservative colleagues have said and done.

It is a relief at least to be able to say that Westminster's attitude towards the arts and its policy are an aberration. They are exceptional. Although there are certainly other authorities where we would welcome stronger support for the arts, and for museums as well, I pay tribute to the many local authorities whose commitment to the arts is unhesitating and strong, and who are actively developing their cultural strategies. Just as joined-up Government is necessary in Whitehall, so it is necessary between central and local government in terms of the arts as in other sectors. I value our partnership at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport with the Local Government Association and with other individual local authorities and look forward to developing it further.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Referendums Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.34 am

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I went to Brussels on 3 December to visit the European Commission. Hon. Members will pleased to know that I shall not make a speech about the current problems of the Commission. Nor shall I speak about the single currency. However, not knowing that there was a private Member's Bill ballot, and not knowing its result, I was surprised, on reaching my office the following day, to find a large number of messages from people who wanted me to call them. Anyone who comes high in the ballot quickly discovers that he has friends he did not know about—or indeed, has never met.

One is inundated with suggestions for the topic of a Bill. In some ways, that is somewhat insulting—it suggests that one has little imagination and that there are no issues on which one feels strongly. Perhaps most extraordinary were the hundreds of letters I received from supporters of Friends of the Earth. I have been a paid-up member of Friends of the Earth for many years and I know a great deal about the issues on which people wrote to me from all corners of the kingdom. I wonder whether any Member of the House is so feeble that he or she would choose the topic of a private Member's Bill solely on the number of letters received.

Some sensible suggestions were made by serious organisations, and I was tempted by several of them. I was tempted, too, by my own hobby horses and by issues in which I strongly believe. However, one suggestion seemed justified beyond all others. I trust that no one will suggest that my choice has shown a weakness in my character. I have taken up the issue because of the merits of the case, and I was put under no pressure of any description to pursue it.

I cannot pretend to believe that referendums are the best way of governing in a parliamentary democracy. Nevertheless, I accept that the decision on some fundamental constitutional issues is so important that every voter should have the opportunity to register his or her opinion and to decide the matter. In holding that opinion, I agree—rather unusually—with the Prime Minister, who said on 24 July 1994:

> "Although there are cases for having referendums on certain issues and indeed we have said we will have one on the electoral system, I am actually not a great exponent of government by referendum."

Curiously, the Prime Minister seems to have changed his mind a little. The people of Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and London have all had the opportunity to vote in referendums over the past 18 months. Referendums, therefore, have—for good or ill—become part of the government of the United Kingdom, and part of the political process.

Other referendums proposed for the future might have an even more fundamental impact than those already held. Both main parties fought the general election on a pledge to hold a referendum before joining the single currency, and the Liberal Democrats may have pledged that too. The Government have made it plain that they will stand by their pledge.

Proportional representation might be the subject of a referendum, although, as the Labour party is split straight down the middle on the matter, that seems marginally less likely at the moment. If proportional representation were to be introduced following a referendum, it would change the face of government in the UK.

Regional assemblies may be introduced following regional referendums, and that could lead to a fundamental shift of authority from both national and local government. We have even heard some pretty strange ideas about holding referendums by county or district on whether fox hunting should take place in a particular locality.

I have introduced the Bill, therefore, because referendums are here to stay—at least in the short term.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Does my hon. Friend think that there has been a curious omission from the Labour Administration's referendum mania? No one is proposing a referendum for English people about whether they would like their own Parliament.

Mr. Robathan: My hon. Friend takes her individual position on that matter, but I have never met anyone in England who really wants a Parliament. I do not think that many people in Wales want a National Assembly, but that is another matter.

Referendums are here to stay—at least in the short term. I am a democrat and I believe that the democratic process must be fair, and must be seen to be fair. That idea is neither unique nor original to me; I am delighted to say that the realisation that referendums need fair rules has been growing for a number of years. It is to the benefit of a referendum if people can concentrate on the issues rather than on technical questions about the mechanics of referendums and whether they are equitable and fair. If they are not, people will argue about the result after it has happened.

Fair rules should facilitate a result that is beyond question, and that can be accepted by all as a true and fair account of the wishes of a well-informed electorate. In November 1996, the joint Electoral Reform Society and constitution unit commission on the conduct of referendums, under Sir Patrick Nairne, concluded:

"There are no established rules, accepted by the main political parties, for the efficient and fair conduct of referendums. If referendums are to be held in the future and their results accepted, they should be conducted efficiently and ensure the fair presentation of competing views."

I do not always pray in aid the Electoral Reform Society, but that organisation generally wishes to see a fair and democratic process. For instance, on proportional representation we would disagree, but we would agree about the need for a fair referendum on that matter. Indeed, the aims of the Bill have widespread support across the political spectrum and from many organisations that may disagree on issues but agree on democracy. As well as the Electoral Reform Society, Charter 88, the Institute for Constitutional Research and the Jenkins commission have all identified and supported the need for fair rules.

The referendums campaign, which was largely organised by my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell), attracted a large number of signatories with all sorts of backgrounds. Certainly, many Conservatives signed up, but there were also a large number of Liberal Democrats from both Houses, Labour peers, at least eight Labour Members who stuck their heads above the parapet, Law Lords, bishops and academics, again from all parts of the political spectrum.

I stress that that was not a concerted or a sustained campaign. Together with other Members of both Houses I received one letter, which might just as easily have gone in the waste paper bin with all the junk mail that we get, including innumerable pleas to sign early-day motions on some obscure subject. Given the low-key nature of the campaign, the support that it has engendered is remarkable. That is because those people who concern themselves with democracy are concerned to establish a fair method of organising referendums.

My Bill has 11 sponsors. Deliberately, there are three Labour Members, three Liberal Democrats and three Conservatives including me. We also have the invaluable support of the only Independent in the House, the hon. Member for Tatton, who is in Kosovo and so could not be here, together with one representative of the smaller parties. All four parts of the United Kingdom are represented. The House will appreciate that all the Conservatives come from England. Also, those four places that have had referendums are represented. Therefore, the sponsors represent a genuine cross-section of the House and, indeed, the country.

The real genesis and spur for the Bill was the Neill committee report, "Standards in Public Life", on the funding of political parties in the United Kingdom, which was published last October. It made some sensible and important recommendations on the future conduct of referendums, but the first recommendation on referendums—the 83rd recommendation of the report—encapsulates all the others:

"In any referendum campaign there must be a fair opportunity for each side of the argument to be properly put to the voters."

The report quotes evidence given by Peter Riddell of The Times. I do not always agree with him—he is rather new Labour for me—but he gives reasoned evidence when he speaks of the "implications . . . for the way in which the political process operates, for fairness in funding and indeed for fairness in operation. Some things have happened which are already worrying . . . There should be clear rules over the funding of referendum campaigns, the current procedures are chaotic and unfair, especially when the Government is itself a participant."

The report also comments on how political expediency can play a large part in determining how a referendum is organised at present. The report recommends that the Government of the day should remain neutral. One piece of evidence quoted in the report states that the Government, being on one side of the referendum in Scotland, was also able to "write the rules and an information leaflet and send it to every house."

Neill agrees that the Government's being a player and writing the rules is fundamentally wrong.

The Neill committee report also recommends that free mailing should be available to each side in the referendum, as takes place for general elections and as took place in 1975, which seems sensible.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us where his Bill provides for free mailings and deals with the issue that he identified in the previous reference to the Neill report about the involvement of the Government in referendum campaigns.

Mr. Robathan: If the hon. Gentleman will be a little less enthusiastic, he will discover that I am about to come to that. My Bill will only enact the key recommendations of Lord Neill and his committee. Many of the details would be left to a referendums commission. I think that the hon. Gentleman will find that in clause 1.

I will now deal with the details of the Bill. It is a simple Bill of a mere six clauses.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): Before my hon. Friend moves on, will he say why he thinks that the Government have been so longwinded and tardy in responding to the Neill report, which came out in October, as he said? Is not one of the most important aspects of this excellent debate, which he has initiated, the fact that we must get the Minister to tell us when they will respond to the report?

Mr. Robathan: Of course I will let the Government answer for themselves. I am sure that the Minister will do so. If the inquiries that Governments set up to produce reports are genuinely independent, Governments sometimes get replies that they do not like—that applies to all Governments. I fear that the Government did not like the report as much as they had hoped to when they set up the inquiry into political funds. The Minister will have the opportunity to respond and I look forward to hearing his reply.

The first clause sets up the referendums commission, which would enact Neill's central conclusion that there must be an election commission. Since the Bill is concerned with the more narrow issue of referendums, we have called it the referendum commission. Its role also relates to Neill's recommendation 93.

The commission must be independent. In my view, the most suitable committee already exists—the Committee on Standards in Public Life. The numbers would have to be somewhat smaller, but it or a similar committee are what is envisaged in the Bill. It would be an independent, non-partisan committee headed by a High Court judge. The Bill would give the commission great powers to advise the Secretary of State and produce reports on referendums, which would have to be laid before the House and published.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend wants an independent commission, but a commission is only as independent as the people who appoint the commissioners. Does he have any suggestions as to who should do the appointing?

Mr. Robathan: My hon. Friend may be surprised to hear that I have some faith in this Government to observe some impartiality and the democratic process. Just in case anyone does not entirely trust the Government, not only will the Secretary of State make the appointments but the Speaker will have to approve them. We have greater faith in the Speaker, perhaps, than we have—occasionally—in one or two Ministers and possibly others in the Government.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): The hon. Gentleman referred to recommendation 93 of the Neill committee report, which says that the election commission should have as part of its remit reviewing referendums and referendum campaigns. Why does he think that a referendums commission is needed when that committee suggested an elections commission?

Mr. Robathan: I wish that the hon. Gentleman would listen—I have been talking for only 10 minutes. The point is that the Neill committee suggested setting up an elections commission, but the Bill is more narrow and concerns referendums, so in the Bill it is called the referendums commission. However, it would play the same part as that envisaged for the elections commission and if the latter were ever set up, it would take over from the referendums commission. That will be made clear later in my speech.

The Bill mentions that the commission could make recommendations on the wording of any question. In February 1975, NOP ran a poll asking a series of questions about a referendum on the Common Market. I do not always believe in opinion polls—sadly, as May 1997 showed, they tend to be right—but the 1975 poll was illustrative in that it managed to get a majority, on one factually incorrect question, for leaving the Common Market. It also managed to get an 18 per cent. majority in favour of staying in the Common Market on a different question. The result of the referendum was approximately two to one in favour of staying in. That illustrates what we all know: that the wording of the question can dictate the result of the referendum in favour of the person who has set the question.

Significant recommendations could be made by the commission on other issues. The threshold of votes is important. Hon. Members will remember that that notion was included in the referendum in Scotland in 1979. For example, the Welsh Assembly has been set up on a vote of approval of only one quarter of the Welsh electorate. Another quarter, approximately, opposed setting up the Assembly and half the electorate did not care one way or the other. It is not the business of the Bill to determine what recommendations the commission might make, but that could be one area for examination. Another issue to be considered would be the timing of separate related referendums.

The aim of the commission is to take political expediency out of the calculation of a referendum. The Welsh referendum was held exactly a week after the Scottish one—a case in point. The Government alleged that they were held on different days to avoid confusion. Most people in all parties would agree that the idea was that the Scottish vote, which was, rightly, expected to be heavily in favour, would influence the Welsh vote. The House might note that there does not seem to be any confusion about having separate elections to the Scottish Parliament, the Welsh Assembly and local authorities on the same day

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): The hon. Gentleman does not represent Wales or have the benefit of parliamentary colleagues who could advise him on the situation that prevailed in Wales before the election. If he had, he would realise that there is a media deficit in Wales, which does not have a national printed press such as the Scots enjoy. There was therefore a need for objective information sponsored by the Government on the implications of Welsh devolution. Does he accept that there are distinctions to be drawn between the Welsh and Scottish experiences of devolution?

Mr. Robathan: With all due respect to the hon. Gentleman, that was an unwise intervention. It is kind of him to make my case. The point about the Neill recommendations is that the Government should not determine what people think. The Government are bound to take a line, but, with all the paraphernalia of the civil service, they should not tell people which way to vote. The hon. Gentleman should read the Neill report with particular reference to its comments on the Welsh referendum.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I am sorry further to trouble my hon. Friend on the composition of the referendums commission, a point that was ably raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), but does he agree that it is crucial that its composition should be scrupulously politically impartial? It is therefore essential to ensure either that it contains people of different political faiths or people of no known political convictions. Does he agree that it would be supremely inappropriate for someone such as Lord Jenkins to serve on it unless he were counterbalanced by someone of known contrary opinions on the matters in hand?

Mr. Robathan: I accept that, but I think that the Home Secretary, who would appoint the commission, would be impartial. It is difficult to lay down too much in a private Member's Bill, though there may be scope for amendment. The Speaker's Office takes a pretty independent line. Madam Speaker would not allow a commission of such weight to be rigged.

[Mr. Robathan]

Clause 2 deals with the designation of referendum campaigns and requires a brief explanation. It relates to comments in the Neill report. It is intended that the referendums commission hear from all those who wish to be the designated campaign for a particular outcome. I hope that that would allow—indeed, encourage—groups pursuing the same end to come together in an umbrella group. The Neill committee's comments seem to have been influenced by the fact that both groups in the 1975 Common Market referendum were described as

"entirely self-appointed federations of activists".

I hope that broad-based, inclusive campaigns will be designated by the commission. That relates to recommendation 85 of the report.

Clause 3(1) enacts recommendation 84, which states:

"each side should be given equal access to an amount of core funding sufficient to enable it to mount at least a minimal campaign and to make its views widely known."

Other recommendations on accounting are covered by clause 3.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): I sympathise with the principles of the Bill, but, like others, I find its mechanics difficult to work out. Has the hon. Gentleman considered how designating referendum campaigns would work in extreme situations, such as the referendum on the Good Friday agreement in Northern Ireland? Groups from opposite extremes supported the agreement while equally extremely opposed groups campaigned against it. Perhaps no proposal could cover that. Similarly, in the Scottish referendum, different political parties supported devolution but were not prepared to work together. I realise that the point is general and does not relate only to the Bill. It is a difficult issue affecting a general principle that I largely support.

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Lady makes a sensible point, unlike one or two others. Clause 2(2) allows the commission to consider the ability of a group to conduct an effective campaign and the views of political parties. In Northern Ireland, it could have considered whether political parties were prepared to coalesce on the issue. It can consider the degree of public support and

"such other matters as the Commission considers relevant."

We must not be too prescriptive because that would take us away from the independent judgment of what happens in referendums that I want. It should not be for me to lay down that this or that group, generally or specifically, should be designated as a campaigner. The commission should consider such matters.

To take Europe: many from all parts of the political spectrum wish to go into a single currency. Many, many groups wish to oppose it, from, dare one say it, the Conservative party, right the way across the spectrum to trade unions. It is up to those groups to get together and present themselves as a designated campaign or forgo core funding. That puts the onus on the groups involved, rather than on the Bill. It is left to the referendums commission to decide what to do.

Judy Mallaber: The Bill is a useful opportunity to discuss difficult issues, and, even if it does not pass, we will return to them in a subsequent one. Would it be feasible to have two different designated campaign bodies on the same side of the argument? Unless it is a simple issue, there will be a great variety of interests that may not be prepared to coalesce but had equal claim to some of the money to argue their particular position.

Mr. Robathan: I wish that I shared the hon. Lady's confidence that, if the Bill does not get through, the same measures will be pursued by the Government. I do not think that such designation would be reasonable. Lord Neill's report says that there should be one designated campaigner. It is a complicated report, so I shall not quote it in its entirety. People should come together. If they are not willing to, they can campaign on whatever they like. I am glad that this remains a free country. In 1979, the right hon. Member for Airdrie and Shotts (Mrs. Liddell), when she was, I think, general secretary of the Scottish Labour party, said that she was not prepared to enter a loose umbrella group.

Mr. Bercow: Soil her hands.

Mr. Robathan: I think that that was the quote. That was up to her. It is up to any group to campaign as it wishes, but if people want public money—the dosh—they must come together in an umbrella group. Some people may not need the dosh.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): Does my hon. Friend recall that part of the answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) is that this feature of the Bill was suggested by none other than the Government themselves?

Mr. Robathan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that assistance.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Robathan: I will, and then I must make some progress.

Mr. Cash: The question arises whether we would exclude money coming from certain quarters, not least the European Commission and the panoply of bodies in the European Union, because they have a vested interest in a yes vote. Another question is whether limits should be imposed on the amount of expenditure on either side of the argument. I am sure that those matters could be dealt with in Committee.

Mr. Robathan: Those are extremely important points. The question of limits is raised in the Neill committee report. I have judged it best to leave the matter to the independent referendums commission. As for money from the European Commission, it seems to me that that would count as taxpayers' money—it certainly does not come from trees—and should be joined with the other stuff, but that would be up to the referendums commission.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): To return to what my hon. Friend said a moment ago about the Government's attitude to the issue that he raises, does he recall the Government's reaction to the Neill committee? They said that they agreed with the main thrust of its recommendations. Can my hon. Friend conceive of any circumstances in which the issue could not be said to fall within the main thrust of the recommendations?

Mr. Robathan: Of course, no. It is entirely within the main thrust of the recommendations. The clause is designed solely to implement one of the Neill committee's recommendations.

Mr. Dismore: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robathan: I will, but I should make progress to give others who sit here waiting a chance to contribute.

Mr. Dismore: I wish to pursue a different aspect of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber). Clause 2 says that the commission shall certify a body in relation to each of the possible outcomes of a referendum campaign. In the London referendum, mercifully, we had only two possible outcomes—for or against. If the Government had given the Opposition their way, we would have had an additional question on whether we should have a mayor or an assembly, and, if they had given the Liberal Democrats their way, there would have been a question on whether the assembly should have tax-raising powers. If all those questions had been incorporated, there would have been seven possible outcomes. Would the Bill allow for an individual or body to represent each of the seven different outcomes? As I read the Bill, it would.

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Gentleman is right to read the Bill in that way, but the point is that the referendums commission would determine what was fair in discussions with the Government as the Bill went through Parliament. The amount of money would not be enormous. I put a question to the hon. Gentleman for him to mull over quietly—I do not intend to give way to him again in the near future. Is the purpose of a referendum to discover what the electorate think on a particular issue? The answer may not be yes or no. It may be yes, no, yes, yes, perhaps this way or perhaps that way. If there is to be a referendum, it has to be fair. It is no good simply saying, "Back me, we are the Government. Trust Tony"—or whoever it might be.

Clause 3(2) gives equal access to the broadcast media to both sides in a campaign. It relates to the general thrust of Neill about the "fair opportunity for each side of the argument to be properly put to the voters", in recommendation 83. It also reflects the comments that Neill makes on broadcasting:

"The broadcasters fully recognise their obligation to be fair to the various parties participating in referendum campaigns and to be neutral between them".

He concludes:

"The broadcasters should consider allocating free airtime to the two umbrella organisations on each side of a referendum, if two such umbrella organisations exist. There seems no reason on the face of it why the broadcasters should not follow the lead of the election commission in this matter".

Clause 4 deals with reports and relates to recommendation 93 of the Neill report. It puts the referendums commission in its context relating to the progress of legislation on a referendum through the Houses of Parliament.

Judy Mallaber: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robathan: I think not, for the moment.

Clause 5 provides for money for expenses relating to the referendums commission and to the Bill, and clause 6 cites the measure as the Referendums Act 1999.

This is a short and simple Bill. One might have thought that it was so simple that I could sit down now. Do I hear cries of "hear, hear"? No. One would have expected that the Government, who instituted the Neill committee in November 1997, would welcome any legislation that enacted the committee's recommendations as speedily as possible. It will certainly be a year between publication of the report and the time when the Bill comes back for Report and Third Reading.

At my first meeting at the Home Office, I was pleasantly surprised by the sympathetic hearing that I received. However, sadly—the Minister is a decent chap—and unbelievably the Government now seem unwilling to accept the recommendations of the report that they instituted. I fear that the Government intend to block this cross-party measure, which all democrats support.

Contrary to appearances, I am not entirely naive. My initial reaction was that I would meet some Government opposition. I have had a bet with a colleague that the Government would not give the Bill a fair wind—a bet that I have already won. The previous Government also had a great suspicion of private Member's measures, but I have gone to great lengths to allay the suspicions of this Government. There is no hidden agenda. This is just a very simple Bill to enact recommendations of which the Government appear to approve. There are some decent Government Members who, I hope, are as disappointed as I am that the Government may seem to obstruct the measure.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), has, I fear, been told to write to me to state that to legislate at the moment. Weasel words. If this is genuinely a question of timing, I offer to withdraw the Bill now. I will withdraw it if the Home Secretary will come to the House and guarantee that the provisions of the Bill and all the recommendations of the Neill Committee on referendums will be placed on the statute book before any other referendum takes place in the United Kingdom. I think it unlikely that I shall be withdrawing the Bill.

"it would not be sensible"

The Government's position is as follows:

"The Home Secretary has made it clear that we will publish a draft Bill before the Summer Recess".

Shall I list those White Papers, stated intentions and draft Bills that have been published and never seen the light of day? I have a list of draft Bills here. They have all been waiting more than a year and they include the Environment Agencies Bill, published in 1984, the Commonhold Bill, published in 1996, the Lotteries

[Mr. Robathan]

(Frequent Draw) Bill, published with a consultation letter in January 1998, and the Offences Against the Person Bill, published in February 1998. I wonder how much longer we will have to wait for all those Bills.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robathan: No.

Draft Bills and White Papers have a habit of being kicked into the proverbial long grass. If a Bill containing the clauses in my Bill is promised for the next legislative Session, with the conditions that I have made already, I will withdraw my Bill, but the Minister tells me that such promise can be given, because

"the Government's legislative programme for a Session is not announced in advance of the Queen's Speech."

As a general rule, that may have some validity, but we all know that it is not true. It is quite one of the lamest excuses that I have ever seen given by a Minister or by his civil servants.

In his courteous and friendly letter, the Minister states:

"We intend to legislate on the main findings of the Neill report as a package."

The letter points out that the report contains 100 detailed recommendations, but it does not say that all the recommendations, particularly those relating to referendums, will be enacted. The Government will argue that there is some logic in proceeding steadily and sensibly with the Neill package.

I would accept that logic if the guarantee for which I have asked were given. But how can one accept the logic that may obstruct the Bill, when the Bill does not entail any great costs or cause any great problems for the legislative process, or for the civil service? It is a simple question of passing the recommendations into legislation. If it is never used because it is superseded by a Government Bill which incorporates its provisions, I shall be very content. My Bill could be passed, and members of the Neill committee could be provisionally appointed as the referendums commission but put on hold pending the Government's Bill, which could contain a clause saying that my Bill was repealed because all the provisions were now incorporated in the new package Government Bill. I would be very happy with that.

My Bill might have deficiencies—I have never claimed to be a brilliant parliamentary draftsman, although I have received great assistance from the Public Bill Office, to whose staff I pay tribute. I should be happy to change its name to "The Referenda Bill" if its current title offends Latin scholars. I do not suffer from such a high degree of amour propre that I should mind in the least if the Government were to take over the Bill. However, what I, all hon. Members on both sides of the House and all democrats both inside and outside the House care about is that any future referendum in this country should be conducted according to fair rules. Past referendums have not allowed sufficient voter awareness. If referendums are to be part of our political process, voters must know both or all sides of the argument and be aware of how their vote will influence their life. If the Government obstruct the Bill, as I believe that they intend to do, I shall be hugely disappointed, not because of some misplaced pride or personal vanity, but because the Government will be obstructing the process of democracy.

The Government's true position was given by the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) on 18 October, on "Breakfast with Frost"; I commend a tape or a transcript of that programme to hon. Members. When asked whether the Government were obliged to accept the Neill recommendations, the right hon. Gentleman replied:

"We don't have to but we need to be mindful of the analysis that he is offering."

The right hon. Gentleman is not present, and I apologise for not having mentioned to him that I would be quoting his words, but I am not criticising him. Even if his position is now more humble than it was then, he remains a force to be reckoned with in Government thinking.

During the debate on the Neill report on 9 November, the Home Secretary was equally equivocal, especially about the position of the Government in a referendum. Let the Minister now present put all that equivocation behind him and say where the Government stand on all the recommendations of the Neill committee. Yesterday, I gave the Leader of the House, with the Home Secretary sitting next to her, an opportunity to state the Government's case, but the right hon. Lady failed to do so.

Perhaps in all this can be seen the hand of Alastair Campbell: a man who defended the actions of Robert Maxwell through the pages of The Mirror and who was described by a High Court judge—perhaps the same judge as I would have to lead the referendums commission—as:

"A witness in whom one can have no confidence".

Sadly, however, he is a man whose influence on decisions made by the Labour Government is all-pervasive.

The Government spend a lot of time calling themselves "the people's Government", and almost every policy is the people's this or the people's that. It is not a cheap jibe to point out that everyone in the House knows the contempt that the Government have shown, and continue to show, for Parliament. However, if they obstruct this valuable and small constitutional measure—a measure that will assist the people when voting in referendums—this arrogant Government will have shown that they have a contempt for the people that I thought even they would never dare to show. I commend the Bill to the House.

10.13 am

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I am glad to have an opportunity to speak on the Bill, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on having introduced it. I shall not support the Bill, but it gives us an opportunity to discuss the important issues surrounding referendums.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I am not greatly enthusiastic about holding referendums, although I believe that, on certain important and crucial issues, it is right to give the people of this country their say through a referendum. The Government of the day were right to hold the 1975 referendum, because it gave the people an opportunity to make a decision on what was then the Common Market and is now the European Union. Similarly, it was right of the new Labour Government to follow the example set by the Labour Government in 1978-79 and hold referendums on whether to establish a Parliament in Scotland and an Assembly in Wales. Those referendums gave the people of Scotland and Wales the right to grant legitimacy to that form of devolution by showing that they wanted it. The results of those two referendums fully endorsed the commitment given during the 1997 general election and gave legitimacy to the bodies that are to be established after the May elections in Scotland and Wales.

The hon. Member for Blaby referred to the London referendum. Again, it was right to hold a referendum on the subject of whether to have a mayor and assembly for London. This time, having reorganised London government, we do not want it to be undone as soon as there is a change of Government; the people have shown that that is what they want and that they do not want it to be changed subsequently. I well recall the Herbert commission in the 1960s recommending that changes be made to the system of local government. The year after the 1963 election, the new Greater London council took full effect, followed 10 years later by changes to the metropolitan counties. Those changes—reorganisation in London and in the rest of the country—were introduced by Conservative Governments, but were then undone by the Thatcher Government because the bodies concerned would not do exactly what she wanted them to do. This time, the people of London have expressed a clear view on what they want.

There are two crucial future referendums. First, there is to be the referendum on whether to join the single currency. As a strong supporter of the euro, I believe the sooner that referendum is held, the better. Manufacturing industries in my constituency believe that it is crucial that Britain should be involved in the euro, and in the decision-making processes at an early stage, rather than trying to join it at a late stage. If we had been in Europe right at the start, we would have been in on the formulation of the common agricultural policy; as it is, we joined late and then tried to make changes.

The second referendum to which we are committed is on the Jenkins proposals. I realise that I am standing behind some of my hon. Friends who hold a different view from mine on the question of proportional representation versus first past the post, but I am firmly committed to campaigning in favour of first past the post. However, it is right that the people of this country should be given a chance to determine whether any change should be made, because those are extremely important issues.

New Zealand held a referendum on the same issues and, on the basis of an extremely low poll, eliminated first past the post from its system, with the result that, in the second-stage referendum, first past the post could not be considered. Even though the poll was far higher and people had changed their minds by the time the second referendum was held, they were not able to choose to stay as they had been, but had to vote for some alternative. It is therefore absolutely crucial that we get the question absolutely right when we hold our referendum on the same subject. The form of the question is an issue covered by the Bill. We have to ensure that the question is put correctly, so as to give people the proper choice.

In connection with the issues of publicity and how opposing campaigns are run, we need to consider the only nationwide referendum held in this country: the 1975 referendum on the Common Market.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Would the hon. Gentleman concede that the 1975 referendum was held simply to cover up the splits in the Labour party? The then Labour Government could not take a firm decision themselves, so they subcontracted the decision to the people of this country. They held a referendum to cover up the splits that the issue had caused in their own party.

Mr. Pike: The hon. Gentleman might be partially correct, but it does not really matter; if he had been listening to what I was saying, he might not have intervened.

I accept that, at that time, the Labour Government were divided, but they made a clear decision, right at the start, that all members of the party, both inside and outside Parliament, should be able to campaign whichever way they wanted during the referendum. We gave the people the opportunity at an early stage—we had been members of the Common Market for only a short time—to decide whether our future lay within the Common Market. The decision taken at that time underpins the way in which we have proceeded in the many years since then, through the single market, the Maastricht treaty, and so on.

It is true to say that about two thirds—a majority—of Labour Members at that time supported the view of the then Prime Minister Harold Wilson that our future lay in Europe. Outside the parliamentary Labour party, about two thirds of Labour supporters rejected that view and only one third were in favour. I make no apologies for the fact that I campaigned vigorously for a yes vote. That did not help my immediate progress within my party, although it did not prevent my selection as the Labour candidate in 1981 to contest the seat of Burnley in the 1983 general election.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: I share my hon. Friend's scepticism about the role of referendums and his fear that they will undermine the strength of Parliament. Although the Government were divided in 1975, that is no reason to argue against referendums—indeed, we could argue that a referendum should be held when a major constitutional issue must be determined and none of the political parties can reach a consensus about it.

Mr. Pike: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It may be that this country will further strengthen its links with Europe over the next 20-odd years.

I referred to the events in 1975 because a clause in this Bill mentions the media. We must look back to 1975 and ensure that we do not make the same mistakes. Although I campaigned for a yes vote in 1975, I believe there was overwhelming pressure on the public to vote yes—despite the steps that were taken to try to ensure that both cases were represented fairly. The broadcasting media was not the only culprit: the overwhelming majority of the press campaigned for a yes vote. This Bill refers to controls on, and access to, the broadcast media, but it does not mention any other ares of the media. It is the same with general elections: we often talk about balance and access with regard to the broadcasting media, but we do not always insist that the same rules apply across the board.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's comments about the 1975 referendum. Does he accept that there is a distinction between a genuine referendum, when the Government remain neutral and there are real divisions across the board, and a bogus referendum, when the Government adopt a clear position but are unwilling to take the risk of testing it by going to the country in a general election?

Mr. Pike: No, I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. I hope that the Government will state clearly that they want the people of this country to vote yes overwhelmingly in a referendum on the euro. That was our position at the last election. We also said in our election manifesto that we would hold a referendum on the voting system. So we have a mandate to hold those referendums. Furthermore, we declared our intention to hold referendums on self-government for Scotland, Wales and London. I do not believe that a choice must be made between holding a referendum or going to a general election.

Judy Mallaber: I have listened carefully to my hon. Friend's remarks. When canvassing during the election campaign specifically on the issue of the euro and whether a referendum could be useful in resolving that question, I met strong Labour supporters who were unhappy about the euro and, similarly, Conservative supporters—although not very many—who were in favour of the euro and unhappy about their party's policy in that regard.

Does my hon. Friend agree that, when views differ within the political parties—although the Government might wish to advance a particular view strongly—it may be helpful to hold a referendum so that the electors do not have to sign up to an entire policy platform? That is particularly important when it comes to major constitutional issues, as I may wish to disagree with my party in a referendum.

Mr. Pike: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct; that is a key point. I have strong views about the voting system and the euro. At the end of the day, I hope that the Government will reach the same conclusions on first past the post—although they may not. It is clear that we should hold referendums to decide such questions. Through his Bill, the hon. Member for Blaby seeks to ensure—as did the Neill report—that people have a genuine opportunity to consider fairly both sides of the argument. I accept the legitimacy of that point.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: My hon. Friend points out correctly that the Neill committee called for fair rules in referendums. Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem with this Bill is that it lacks a series of controls recommended by the Neill committee, such as the requirement to register any campaigning group or individual intending to incur expenditure of more than £25,000? It also lacks any provision to ban donations from foreign sources.

Mr. Pike: I thank my hon. Friend—that is my next point. On the question of publicity, I believe we must regulate the whole of the media, not simply the broadcasting area, if we genuinely wish to ensure that a referendum campaign represents both sides fairly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) is correct to say that the Neill committee cites certain figures and contains recommendations regarding donations by organisations and so on. The Bill's failure to address those points is a serious omission. The Bill also fails to address the question of free mailing and the free use of public rooms. That is not an issue in parliamentary and other elections in this country, and I believe that the same rules should apply to referendums.

I agree with the principle of the Bill. Its introduction provides an opportunity to discuss the issues, but I do not think it goes far enough. I hope that the Bill will not make progress today and, if it does, I hope that it will be much amended in Committee. I look forward to the Government's introducing legislation that addresses all the Neill committee's recommendations, rather than one specific point. The hon. Member for Blaby recited a rather nonsense list of draft Bills, the majority of which were introduced by the previous Government but fell when the general election was called. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's arguments. The Government are fully committed to acting on the Neill committee's recommendations sensibly and positively. They will legislate on the conduct of all elections and referendums.

I had meant to be brief, but interventions have extended my speech. I realise that many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate. I reiterate that I reject the Bill and I am sure that the Government will deal positively with these issues. We will ensure that future referendums are controlled openly and sensibly so that people can exercise their vote on the basis of full and accurate information.

10.30 am

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): I strongly welcome the initiative and success of the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) in introducing the Bill. It is an important opportunity for the House to express its concern to ensure that referendums, which are becoming a regular feature of our constitutional development, are conducted fairly and command complete support—not only while they are being conducted, but afterwards.

In the past 18 months, we have had more referendums than we had in the previous 18 years—perhaps because there was a period of constitutional stasis prior to the last general election—and that has underlined the importance of making rapid progress on the matter. At least two referendums were promised by the Government in their manifesto before the election. The first relates to the possibility of an alternative electoral system for Westminster and the other to the adoption of the euro.

Those are major issues for the country and the setting up of referendums on those questions should be subject to regulation that has been determined prior to the enactment of the necessary Bills to enable the referendums to be held. We need what the constitution unit has called generic referendum legislation. I am encouraged by the fact that the Government are committed to publishing—this summer, I believe—a Bill setting out their conclusions on the Neill committee's recommendations, particularly on an electoral commission.

It is desirable that the work of regulating elections and referendums should be in the charge of a body that is seen to be independent of the Government. The current arrangements are far from satisfactory. The hon. Member for Blaby was right to draw attention to our particular experiences. It was not satisfactory that the Government decided to put a two-question referendum to the Scots without any prior cross-party discussion. That was bounced on the Scots. The outcome was not unfortunate, and I dare say that the Government's political judgment could not be faulted in that case. However, the referendum should have been processed by agreement.

Similarly, the single referendum question put to the people of London about the proposed reform to establish a mayor and an Assembly did not allow for the expression of diverse opinions that might have been more redolent of exactly what the people favoured. Once again, there was a question about the question.

Those two experiences point to the appropriateness of what the hon. Member for Blaby advocates in his Bill: the commission should be able to proffer advice on the referendum question to the Government and Parliament when the arrangements for particular referendums are being contemplated.

The genesis of the hon. Gentleman's proposals goes back a long way. There has long been an awareness of the need for fairness in referendums. I draw attention to a Labour party policy paper, published in 1996, "A New Voice for England's Regions", which says that the Labour party would establish a body that would be "directly and solely responsible for all aspects of electoral administration and for ensuring freedom and fairness in all aspects of our electoral system."

There have been calls from the House for an electoral commission to regulate referendums and elections, notably in the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs of September 1998, HC 768.

The hon. Member for Blaby properly referred to the important recommendations of the commission on the conduct of referendums, established in 1996 by the Electoral Reform Society and the constitution unit at University college, and chaired by Sir Patrick Nairne. That commission concluded:

"The conduct of referendums should be entrusted to a statutory independent body, accountable to Parliament, in order to ensure maximum confidence in the legitimacy of the results."

Extensive reference has been made in the speeches of the hon. Members for Blaby and for Burnley (Mr. Pike) to the recommendations of the Neill report published in October 1998. I have no doubt that the overwhelming majority of hon. Members broadly agree with those recommendations and want them to be enacted as soon as possible.

The House will have to come to grips with certain of the Neill report's recommendations, for example, on the making of the Government's case. I said when the report was published, and still believe, that the mere decision to hold a referendum should not make it more difficult for the Government freely to express their side of the argument. That is almost certainly not the intention of the Neill committee, but some of the language in the report gave support to the view that the Government should drop out during a referendum and leave the advocacy of their case to an umbrella body. That would be artificial and unsatisfactory.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): I was interested to find out whether the right hon. Gentleman would repeat the comments that he made during last year's debate on referendums. He remarked on the Government's role in fighting in a referendum and he now repeats that it would be artificial for them to have to contract the expression of their case to an outside body over which they would have no control. Does he agree that the Bill would force a Government into that position and that they would not be able to spend money to support their own case?

Mr. Maclennan: The Bill contains a risk of that happening, but it could possibly be amended in Committee to take account of the problem. The clear objective of the Neill committee, the Bill, myself and, no doubt, the hon. Gentleman is that there should be fairness as well as clarity on both sides. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. A number of private conversations are breaking out. Hon. Members ought to listen to the right hon. Gentleman, who is addressing the House.

Mr. Maclennan: As referendums are, of their nature, held on questions of Government policy, it is clearly right that the advocacy of the Government's case should not be subcontracted to any other body and the Government should be the spokesmen on the issue.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: The right hon. Gentleman said that, in a couple of instances, the Neill report had arrived at the wrong conclusion. I would suggest that it also arrived at the wrong conclusion about the spending limits for referendums. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that one of the criticisms of, and concerns about, the 1975 referendum was the wide disparity in the funding of the two campaigns, and that spending limits should be imposed in referendums?

Mr. Maclennan: It is unquestionably true that there was great disparity in the 1975 campaign and that it may have had an untoward effect on perceptions about its fairness. Again, we have to avoid artificiality. A Minister appearing on a broadcast, saying what the Government's view is, might cost almost nothing but have an immense impact. Somehow we have to maintain a balance.

I am not entirely happy about the Bill's mechanistic proposals on broadcasting. Broadcasters might give less attention than they should to both sides of the case if we constrain them too much by the proposed rules of balance. However, the reason behind the proposals is extremely important—there should be fairness, and broadcasters should seek to ensure that there is. This is precisely the type of matter on which the House would value not so much the regulations in the Bill, as the advice of a truly independent referendums election commission, which would no doubt carry great weight with broadcasters.

The Bill has great merit, especially in that it focuses on the urgency of the situation. It was quite right to introduce the Bill. I have no complaints about that, even in the knowledge that the Government intend to introduce an election commission Bill at some stage. It is right for the House to know that referendums are coming down the pipe. We want to make sure well in advance that we are not bounced into passing a referendum Bill to establish a poll on the euro, without having a well-established framework that is accepted by all parties and understood throughout the country. It would lend great weight to the outcome of such a referendum if such a framework were established soon.

[Mr. Maclennan]

I hope that, as a result of this debate, we might hear a little more from the Government about their intention to introduce a Bill and whether they would like it to be enacted in the next Session of Parliament. I heard the Minister saying that Governments do not divulge what will be in the Queen's Speech. That rule is becoming more honoured in the breach than in the observance, although I do not expect the Minister to give a definitive response today.

There is widespread support for the introduction of a draft Bill this Session. Indeed, I and my right hon. and hon. Friends have suggested that it would be possible to introduce a draft Bill in this Session of Parliament and carry it through into the next, a procedure that the Government have already adopted in respect of an electronic commerce Bill and a financial services Bill. There is much merit in getting matters into the open as soon as possible to get comment and support from all sides so that we can ensure that we reach our common ends in good time.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on introducing the Bill. As has just been said, there is recognition of the need for reform. The question that we have to ask today is whether the Bill deals with that need in the way that it should. As the hon. Gentleman may have gathered from my interventions, my main concern is that many of the issues that need to be addressed have been left out of the Bill. They include, for example, the registration of campaigners, funding rules—including those in relation to donations—and the role of the Government in referendums, something that the hon. Gentleman touched on in response to me. I shall return to those issues later.

Mr. Letwin: I do not want to detain the hon. Gentleman for long, but would it be of interest to him to know that the suggestion to remove the registration of campaigners derives from his Government?

Mr. Dismore: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be patient and wait for me to get to that point.

Any reform should be comprehensive. In response to a motion for the Adjournment of the House on 9 November 1998, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made it clear that the Government were going to consider the issue in the round. He said:

"The next step is to turn the report"— the report into the funding of political parties—

"into legislation. We are setting about that straight away. It will not be possible to introduce and carry through a measure of such scope with due attention to getting the framework and the detail right in the next Session of Parliament, but we intend to introduce a draft Bill before the next summer recess and to bring forward legislation so that new rules can be in place before the next general election."—[Official Report, 9 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 53.]

There has been a great deal of argument about the Government's intention, but the Home Secretary's remarks were given particular force and emphasised by the Lord Chancellor when he spoke at the annual constitution unit lecture on 8 December 1998. The Lord Chancellor stressed the importance that the Government attach to the issue and said:

"As the Home Secretary has made clear, we shall be giving careful consideration to all the Neill Committee's recommendations on the conduct of referendums and we will examine how best to take them forward in the context of the draft Bill which we will be publishing by next year's summer recess."

I understand the impatience of the hon. Member for Blaby that progress be made in respect of the Neill committee's recommendations, but he is jumping the gun because the Government have said that their Bill will be published by the summer and that we shall be able to consult more widely on much of the detail.

Judy Mallaber: Does my hon. Friend agree that referendums and the broader matters raised by the Neill committee's recommendations are complex? I have not looked at them in great detail, but I am finding it hard to work out exactly how the proposals should be implemented. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government's Bill would benefit from pre-legislative scrutiny by a Committee of the House? Might not that assist us in making sure that the Bill is not only properly formulated but has support from all parts of the House? We have to get it right, otherwise we shall lose the legitimacy of the democratic and political process.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. When I was researching my speech for tonight—[HON. MEMBERS: "Tonight?"] I spent a happy hour or two in the Library the other night. The more I read up on this matter—I read the Neill report, the Jenkins commission's report, the Library brief, Hansard and all the other documentation available—the more that I became increasingly concerned that the detailed issues, some of which have already begun to be elucidated, were much more complex than might appear at first blush. I therefore welcome my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's announcement about the draft Bill. The suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) that there should be pre-legislative scrutiny of that Bill would be an excellent way to proceed. In longer discussions we could flush out the important issues that are already starting to emerge at this early stage.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: My hon. Friend has obviously conducted wide research for his speech. Was he able to look at the Home Affairs Committee report on electoral law and administration? If he has seen it, would he comment on the evidence presented by Dr Butler and Professor Blackburn, who expressed concern at the large number of bodies with a role in the electoral process? One of their arguments in favour of an electoral commission with responsibility for the rules governing referendums, was that that would allow a much more coherent view of those matters to be taken.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I admit that that is one of the reports that I have not read; perhaps my hon. Friend will lend me his copy afterwards so that I may read up on what the Home Affairs Committee said. There is much in what my hon. Friend says; in fact, that would have been my next point.

One of my main anxieties about the Bill is the fact that the hon. Member for Blaby regards the Bill as a referendum Bill, and therefore he proposes a referendum commission, which might, in due course, be subsumed into an elections commission. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) makes an extremely important point when he says that we risk a plethora of different bodies advancing a variety of ideas and suggestions, some of which may be mutually contradictory.

Later, if there is time, I hope to point out some of the contradictions that exist between, for example, the Jenkins report and the Neill report on one or two of those important issues. In that context, I believe that it is extremely important that one body oversees all these issues—a Neill committee recommendation that the hon. Gentleman does not seem to have taken into account when drafting the Bill.

Mr. Cash: Surely the Government would understand that there is a distinction between a referendum and an election. I strongly support the proposal made by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), irrespective of the Neill committee report, for precisely that reason. There are rules relating to broadcasting and to expenditure which are, and should be, specifically geared to the question of the issues that arise in a referendum, which is quite different from an election. The electorate vote in both elections and referendums, but in one case one is asking for support for a Government, and in the other for support for a yes or a no to a question.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting intervention, but I am not sure that the distinction that he draws is as clear cut as he suggests. In the end, many of the issues that a referendum commission would address—precisely the points that the hon. Gentleman raises about party funding or campaign funding—need to be looked at in the round. It would be bizarre if, for example, the ceiling on funding for a referendum campaign was totally out of kilter with the ceiling on party election funding for a general or local election. Those issues need to be considered comprehensively, in the round, as the Neill committee recommended.

Sir Michael Spicer: It was the Neill committee that drew the distinction between endorsement of policy and consultation about policy, which is what a referendum is all about. That was a fundamental point within the Neill committee, and much flows from that.

Mr. Dismore: I do not believe that that greatly affects my argument. I believe that a single body should oversee all the aspects of involving the electorate in the decision-making process, whether it be through elections or referendums, to ensure that we have a comprehensive way of supervising those things that knits together and does not produce contradictory and conflicting ideas.

Mr. Linton: Does my hon. Friend agree with the evidence that the Labour party submitted to the Neill committee—but that, sadly, does not appear in its report and is not incorporated into the Bill—that there should be a limit of £5 million on what a party spends in a referendum campaign, and of £500,000 on what any outside organisation spends, to prevent the huge spending that has been mentioned? At one stage, Paul Sykes said that he might give £20 million to the no side in a referendum campaign. Whatever one's view on that, such huge donations risk distorting a campaign. The Bill would benefit from a limit on spending.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I know that he has done a great deal of work on all the issues relating to elections and referendums. He makes a valid point and I hope to return to it. Whatever emerges from the decision-making process, there must be a level playing field and, inevitably, that must include caps on spending during an electoral or referendum campaign.

In that context, we need to consider the issue of donations made by individuals to campaigns, to ensure that those are properly supervised and above board. That is another issue that the Bill does not address, and to which I hope to return shortly.

I shall now consider some of the detail of the Bill. My first concern is that, although the Bill is called the Referendums Bill, nowhere in it do we find a definition of "referendum". There could be a very grey area about whether something was a referendum.

Perhaps I may start my development of this argument by questioning the hon. Member for Blaby about whether a ballot on the future of an individual grammar school would be a referendum in the context of the Bill. As I read the Bill, I believe that a grammar school ballot would fall within the definition, because that ballot would be held under an enactment, which is the criterion that the hon. Gentleman sets for control of the referendum by his proposed referendum commission.

Mr. Robathan: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman's wise and wonderful words with great interest for the past 13 minutes. I note, though, that his interest in referendums must be quite new, as he has only recently realised what a referendum means. I trust that he has consulted a dictionary. Could it possibly be that he has been asked—I should like him to state categorically whether this is the case—by a member of the Government to make as long and boring a speech as possible? If he is one of those supine and feeble members of Government parties who do such things, may I assure him, from my greater experience in the House, that it never leads to advancement and always elicits the scorn of his fellows?

Mr. Dismore: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman finds my speech boring. The interventions that I have had from both sides of the House may show that it is not as boring as he says. Perhaps I may return the compliment and say that I found his recitation a little turgid.

The hon. Gentleman questions whether I know what a referendum is. I actually asked that question of him. Perhaps it is my legal training, but, as a lawyer, if I were to take a case—which of course I would not, because I am not taking cases while a Member of Parliament—I might well be asked to construe the Bill. I was going to give one or two examples later of how the legal profession might make a large amount of money out of the Bill. That might be done by taking advantage of the lack of a definition of "referendum".

When the hon. Gentleman intervened, I was giving the example of grammar school ballots. I believe that, as the Bill stands, a referendum commission would look at grammar school ballots, because those ballots are conducted under the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 and the Education (Grammar School Ballots) Regulations 1998. The Library brief says that categorically.

Judy Mallaber: I am slightly surprised, as a non-lawyer, that my hon. Friend is suggesting that the Bill might apply to referendums on the future of grammar schools—an issue in which I am greatly interested. Will he give me some advice as a lawyer? I do not like to be rude about lawyers, but they are all able to go on at inordinate length about the most nit-picking matters. I believe that it comes naturally to them; they never need to be asked to do so.

Can my hon. Friend give me guidance on clause 2(1)? It appears to me that, when the Bill says that the referendum would apply to "any bill which provides for the holding of a referendum",

it means that it would apply only to a referendum campaign in respect of that referendum—that is, that referendum would have to have been specifically mentioned in the Bill and therefore, on my reading of it—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must sit down when I am speaking. The hon. Lady's interventions are getting longer and longer. I think that she has said enough in this intervention.

Mr. Dismore: I think that I have the thrust of my hon. Friend's point.

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 11 (Friday Sittings).

11 am

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the proposed privatisation of the education directorate in Hackney.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Secretary of State is not proposing to privatise the education directorate in Hackney. He has today written to the leaders of the three political parties in Hackney to say that, having considered the findings of the Office for Standards in Education inspection report on Hackney local education authority, which is published today, he is of the opinion that the LEA is failing to perform a number of functions to an adequate standard, and that he is minded to direct the director of education of Hackney LEA to contract out several functions. Contractors could include public sector or private sector bodies or consortiums. The LEA has been given until 13 April to comment on the proposal. We are determined to ensure that every child in Hackney receives a good education. That is why the Secretary of State is taking this course of action.

Ms Abbott: I begin by thanking Education Ministers for briefing me on this subject yesterday and saying that I did not break the embargo on the information.

I regret very much that no Education Minister felt able to respond to my private notice question. I think that it is unprecedented for a Member to table a private notice question and for it to be accepted by Madam Speaker, but for no Minister from the Department concerned to make themselves available to respond. That shows a rather derisory attitude to the House. [Interruption.] I am afraid I do think that. Indeed, I shall go further.

It was a very bad practice of the previous Government to make announcements at press conferences that should properly have been made on the Floor of the House. I very much regret that my Government have followed that practice. It cannot be right that Ministers are engaged in a press conference instead of reporting to the House on a step of national significance. Ministers clearly believe that today's announcement is of national significance because they were on the "Today" programme this morning, and are holding a major press conference as we speak. [HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful".] That is why they are not here, and a Treasury Minister is here instead.

I tabled a private notice question because I felt that the matter was of significance far beyond Hackney. Today, Ministers will be taking the first step towards taking control of a key aspect of education away from local democratic control. Local democratic control of education is one of the most important pillars of local democracy, and it should not be undermined lightly. There can be no doubt that the decision on which Ministers are, as we speak, making a statement to the press will take away significant local control over some of the most important areas of education policy.

There has been absolutely no local consultation about this step. It will not do for Ministers to say that they are taking it on behalf of Hackney parents and children, because they have not visited Hackney or consulted local people. They have certainly not consulted Members of Parliament who represent the area on whether we want any aspects of the education directorate's work put out to tender. I take very seriously that lack of consultation on this unprecedented step.

Putting the most important aspects of the education directorate's work out to tender is an experiment. We have no knowledge of whether it will improve Hackney schools. Ministers should not be experimenting in Hackney if they have no knowledge of whether contracting out the inspectorate and other education directorate functions will improve matters. Precisely because of the borough's problems, Ministers should not be experimenting in Hackney.

I understand that Ministers' proposals will not involve privatising all the LEA's functions, but in a way, that makes matters worse. What is a cannibalised LEA supposed to do? Some functions will be taken away; some will be left to the LEA. Ministers have not explained—either yesterday, or in today's brief and rather cursory statement—how they imagine that an LEA can remain viable following the removal of its key strategic functions.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have been listening carefully to the hon. Lady, who has been making an interesting point—but she has been asking questions further to her private notice question for six minutes during time that has been allocated to private Members Bills.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): There is some justification in the right hon. Gentleman's point of order. I trust that the hon. Lady will remember that this is not a debate and will fairly quickly come to the end of her remarks.

Ms Abbott: I take that point of order in good part, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Why did not Ministers feel it appropriate to consult locally before taking this step? Are they confident that a cannibalised LEA will be viable? What will be the role of the education officer? It seems that the education officer will have no control, and be reduced to a monitoring officer. How much will the consultants who are brought in to advise on the contract cost? What proportion of the total contract do Ministers anticipate outside contractors will receive as the management fee for running the LEA?

Will Ministers assure me that, before the contract is finalised and put out to tender, my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) and I will have the opportunity, on behalf of local people, to see it and comment on it? Do Ministers understand that this step is viewed by people in Hackney with the utmost concern? The lack of consultation and the piecemeal nature of the steps proposed give rise to local concern. I hope that the Economic Secretary will be able to answer my questions.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is wrong on the question of the press conference. My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department for Education and Employment are not holding a press conference on Hackney: they are all out of London on departmental business, and that is why I am answering the private notice question. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend raised the form of the announcement with Education Ministers when she met them yesterday, but I think the matter might appropriately be pursued with them.

Ms Abbott: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Hewitt: Perhaps I may make a little progress in answering the very large number of questions that my hon. Friend has put to me.

On the issue of democratic control of education in Hackney, elected members in Hackney and their electors will receive better advice and a better service from efficient contractors on a number of extremely important functions relating to Hackney schools than they have been receiving from inefficient officers. Elected members will continue to have responsibilities, and to be accountable to the electorate, but they will not be able to intervene in professional matters which are properly the preserve of officers.

On the issue of the experiment to which my hon. Friend referred, let me make it quite clear that this course of action is based on overwhelming evidence of the failure, despite recent improvements, of Hackney council to provide a proper education to Hackney children. There have been two inspections of Hackney LEA—the first in 1997—and a Government-funded improvement team worked with the authority for some time. It is clear that some progress, which we welcome, has been made but it is also clear that, in other respects, the progress has been quite unsatisfactory. Taken as a whole, the Ofsted report on the LEA that is published today is damning. Hackney LEA itself has accepted that it is a fair report. Our intention is not to experiment with the education of Hackney children, but to ensure that they get a decent education.

Ms Abbott rose—

Ms Hewitt: I give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister must complete her remarks. She cannot give way.

Ms Hewitt: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

On the question of the cost of the consultants, the Department will bear that cost. The consultants are simply being used to ensure that the contracting-out specifications are drawn up in the most efficient way.

With regard to the involvement of local Members of Parliament, I very much hope that my hon. Friend, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) will work with Ministers in ensuring that, in future, Hackney children get a first-class education.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): I sympathise with the Minister's plight. It is extraordinary that a Treasury Minister is responding to a private notice question that should be answered by an Education Minister. Ministers at the Department for Education and Employment have been active in briefing the media. They have been active on the airwaves. We know that there have been two significant education announcements today, on A-levels and on Hackney. For no Education Minister, apparently, to be in London this morning is extraordinary. That is an insult to the House.

Of course, one reason why no Education Ministers are present is that at least one Education Minister was a councillor in Hackney. The head of the schools standards branch of the Department was also a councillor in Hackney. Perhaps Ministers are not present because they would be embarrassed to show their faces, given what we know about the record of Hackney council.

Does the Minister agree that the problems in Hackney are part of a wider problem identified in the Audit Commission report published last week on the performance of local education authorities? That showed that, of the 15 worst-performing LEAs, including Hackney, 13 are Labour-controlled—none are Conservative—and Conservative LEAs make up a quarter of the best-performing LEAs. The problems in Hackney are part of the wider problem of the failure of Labour in local government.

Now we are told that, because Labour politicians have failed in local government, another bunch of Labour politicians in central Government will come in and solve the problem. However, the problem can be solved only by giving freedom to the schools. Instead, as the Ofsted press notice states:

"Hackney's schools have shown remarkable forbearance and loyalty to the LEA despite the long-term chaos they have experienced. But they are sceptical about the possibility of rapid and sustained improvement. That scepticism is justified."

The Minister admitted that the powers of the LEA are unchanged, the role of the councillors is unchanged, and the new consultants will be employees of the council. The one thing that there will not be is more freedom for the schools. There will be just the opposite: more centralisation and more control.

Does the Minister agree that we have been here before? I remember the previous Minister for School Standards, now the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, boldly announcing towards the end of 1997 that he would send in a hit squad to sort out Hackney. As always, the rhetoric was overheated and the reality was disappointing. We will judge the results of the exercise announced today not on the rhetoric surrounding it, but on what happens in Hackney schools.

Ms Hewitt: First, I have already made it clear that my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department for Education and Employment are fully occupied on Government business, and that they are continuing to carry out their extremely energetic programme to raise standards in our schools from the lamentable level reached under the previous Government.

Secondly, on local education authorities, it is hardly surprising that most LEAs are run by Labour councillors. They have been elected overwhelmingly by people across the country, just as the Government were elected by an overwhelming majority. Very few local voters want Conservatives to be in charge of their LEA, and I am not at all surprised.

Thirdly, on the issue of solving the problem by giving more freedom to schools, I stress that the functions that we are proposing to direct the director of education in Hackney to contract out are planning for school improvements, intervention in schools causing concern, advice on curriculum and professional development, support for secondary schools and improving literacy and language teaching.

Handing over those responsibilities to individual schools which, by definition, have been unable to achieve the desired standards on their own and which have not been getting adequate support from the LEA would not be satisfactory. The answer to the problem is not to withdraw support and leave the schools without adequate support. The answer is to give them proper support.

On the specific question about the contractors, the staff of the private or public sector bodies or consortiums who come in to perform those functions will not be employed by the LEA. They will be employed by the council—I mean the contractor.

There are deep-seated problems in Hackney schools and in the local education authority. We understand the reasons for those problems. We have been working with the council and the LEA to solve them. The decisive action that my right hon. Friend has announced today is further evidence of our determination to ensure that Hackney children get a first-class education in future.

Ms Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): I congratulate my hon. Friend on her comprehensive response to the question, and on being the first person during the 16 minutes of discussion to speak about the importance of providing a decent education to Hackney children, which is presumably what we are here for.

It comes painfully from the Conservative Opposition to speak of overheated rhetoric, when they had 18 years to sort out what was going on in education in Hackney and did nothing about it.

Although I welcome the statement, can my hon. Friend tell the House whether only those functions mentioned in it will be contracted out, or whether it is possible that other functions may be contracted out, if that improves the outcome? The end result must be a better standard of education for Hackney children. The vacuum that has existed over the past few years will now, thank heavens, be filled.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I welcome her commitment to the better education of children in Hackney.

On the question whether other functions might be contracted out, we will ask the consultants to examine the case for contracting out finance, personnel, and information and communications technology services, because those are also unsatisfactory. We will ask the consultants whether it would make sense, in the interests of an orderly and cost-effective discharge of the LEA's functions as a whole, for other functions also to be contracted out, and if necessary, to prepared a specification for that purpose.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): The one thing that will unite all hon. Members is the proposition that we must serve the interests of the young people of Hackney and their families. The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) has done the House a service by asking the question.

The Department for Education and Employment, as one of the great Departments of State, has done the nation a disservice by not making a Minister available on a parliamentary working day. The Department arranged today as the date of the publication of the Ofsted report. The Department managed the publication and was prepared for it. The rest of us were not formally notified. That is why our party is represented by the London spokesman, not the education spokesman. The Department has no excuse, and the House should receive an apology at the earliest opportunity.

I hope that the Minister realises that her colleagues have landed her and the Government in a position that is difficult or impossible to defend. Hackney does not have the worst-performing schools in Britain. The Ofsted report shows that schools have improved recently, not got worse. For the Government to announce their proposals without first consulting the democratically elected members of the local education authority, of whatever party and of all parties, and without consulting colleagues in Parliament undermines the principle of education being run by democratic local government.

The Government have made two bad mistakes—first, by not coming to the House to announce their intentions properly and, secondly, by putting forward proposals to contract out services without even talking first to those elected to run them. I ask that they now seek to unwind their mistakes—that they come to councillors in Hackney before making any further decisions, and to Members of this place before breaking the barrier between what should be run by central Government and what should be run by local government, supported rather than undermined by central Government.

Ms Hewitt: The Department talked to the leaders of the three political parties in Hackney yesterday, as well as to the officers and the chair of the education committee. Those contacts were merely part of a long process of discussion that has been taking place since the Government were elected, to try to improve the situation in Hackney. Furthermore, the publication of the Ofsted report and the letter sent by my right hon. Friend today are simply steps in a long process. It is a "minded to direct" letter; it is not a final decision on contracting out. The LEA has a chance to comment on it, and has been given until 13 April to do so. The director of education will continue to have a key role. As I said in an earlier response, the elected councillors of the LEA will continue also to have a key role. I think that the rather over-blown rhetoric used by the hon. Gentleman is not justified by the facts.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) has raised this issue. I am pleased also to hear my hon. Friend the Minister say that the decision on contracting out is not final and that it is out for comment. Surely it represents a huge change in policy, and not only the House but the Labour party should discuss it in some detail.

I have an interest because Calderdale was the first LEA to be "Ofsteded" in the light of a great deal of extraordinary publicity about the Ridings school. The Conservative Government tried to pretend that we had the worst school in the country, which was nonsensical, as events have proved. Since the Labour Government took office, we have had much help to put things right on that.

In Calderdale, it is clear to anybody that the selective system is the problem. While we have two grammar schools and four opted-out schools, we are left with schools that are secondary moderns. Only a fool would argue against that.

We must have a debate on the whole issue. I am deeply concerned that I heard about it only on the "Today" programme. Like me, my hon. Friend has spent the past 18 years fighting privatisation. My understanding of privatisation was that it involved selling off assets and contracting out. When did that definition change?

Ms Hewitt: I am well aware of, and appreciate, my hon. Friend's concern for the education received by the children in her constituency. I welcome the fact that she has been so active in seeking to improve that situation.

I wish to stress that the action taken and the Ofsted report that has been published today do not represent a criticism of the schools or the teachers in those schools. As my right hon. Friend made clear in his letter to the councillors, he welcomes—as we all do—the improvement that has been shown in several respects. However, the report, despite that improvement in some areas, is a damning criticism of the Hackney LEA, and the situation has to be put right.

My concern, and that of the Government, is not to approach this matter from the standpoint of ideological dogma, but to ensure that the services that must be provided by an LEA to ensure that schools and their head teachers and teachers can carry out their responsibility to give children an excellent education are properly provided. It is a question of what works. What is being provided by Hackney LEA in respect of the functions that we are discussing is not working, and we shall change that situation. I will certainly draw my right hon. and hon. Friends' attention to my hon. Friend's request for a debate.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Will the Minister clarify for the House the annual administrative running costs of Hackney LEA and what proportion of them is accounted for by the services that are to be contracted out? Will those costs be so great that the tendering process will be subject to European Union regulations? If so, how do the Government propose to deal with the hiatus in the running of services during the passage of the tendering process?

Ms Hewitt: I do not have the detailed figures that the hon. Gentleman requests but I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend writes to him on that point. I stress that the process of contracting out some or all of the functions referred to by my right hon. Friend will offer better value for money than wasting public money on an inadequate service. As education is the largest local authority service, we expect it to be possible to have efficiency within the LEA budget. That will be considered in further detail by my right hon. Friend and by the consultants when we come to draw up the specification for the contracts. Of course the tender for the contracts will comply with all the necessary procedures.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): I hope that my hon. Friend will give me some reassurance by saying that she will not have any truck with any of the sanctimonious claptrap that we have heard from Opposition spokespersons about why she is at the Government Dispatch Box today.

My hon. Friend is entirely right to focus on the quality of the advice offered by the LEA. I ask her to contrast the record in Hackney with that in Harrow, where a new Labour administration is delivering high-quality, effective support and advice to schools. I invite her to praise Pinner Wood middle school in my constituency, which has just received an excellent report, partly because of the quality of advice that has been given to it by the LEA.

Ms Hewitt: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's point. I am happy to congratulate not only the school in his constituency, which has received an excellent report, but all the schools in the country that have been making dramatic progress in raising standards, with the help of their LEAs and the Department for Education and Employment under the Government's leadership.

Referendums Bill

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

11.28 am

Mrs. Gorman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) continues, will you give your view on the scope of the Bill and, therefore, the limits of our discussion? As I read it, it is tightly worded on the mechanics of holding a referendum when the Government of the day have proposed that a specific issue should be dealt with in that way, and therefore would exclude discussions of matters such as referendums among parents should a school decide to consider becoming grant maintained, and other diversions which have been introduced by the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber), who seems to be more interested in filibustering this Bill than in dealing with the important issues that it raises.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): The Second Reading of a Bill gives quite wide scope for discussion and debate on the principles of the Bill, and so far this morning that is precisely what we have had.

Mr. Dismore: I think that, before the private notice question I had just taken an intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley in the context of grammar school ballots. My hon. Friend's forensic skills are excellent because I think that she has highlighted a contradiction within the Bill. She drew my attention to clause 2(1), which refers to the holding of a referendum campaign and the designation of that campaign of a Bill. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to clause 4(1), to which I referred in the context of grammar school ballots. It states:

"soon . . . after the introduction to Parliament"

"The Commission shall make a report to the Secretary of State on the conduct of any referendum conducted under any enactment."

The grammar school ballots are being conducted under the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 and the Grammar School (Ballots) Regulations 1998. The Bill would inevitably cover grammar school ballots and the importance of that will become apparent as I proceed with my remarks.

Local referendums are being used increasingly throughout local government. The Government are encouraging that through the White Paper "Modern Local Government, In Touch With the People". Paragraph 3.30 on page 32, which has the heading refers, first, to the Greater London authority ballot. It states that

"support for a directly elected mayor",

"before a council could adopt arrangements which include a directly elected mayor, it should be required to conduct a referendum on its proposals giving local people the opportunity to have their say."

I assume from the Bill's wording that it would apply to a referendum on the election of a mayor for a local authority.

In paragraph 4.8 on page 39 of the White Paper, the Government again stress the importance of referendums in the local government context:

"The Government believes that councils should see and use referendums as an important tool to give local people a bigger say. The Government will therefore introduce legislation to confirm the power of councils to hold referendums."

The White Paper says that referendums may or may not be binding

"except in the particular circumstances described"

and adds:

"Councils might wish to use referendums to consult their local people on such issues as major local developments or matters of particular local controversy."

I assume, therefore, that the Bill would apply to such ballots as well. Page 45 of the House of Commons Library briefing helpfully refers to recent precedent. It says that Milton Keynes council conducted a referendum, in February 1999, seeking

"the views of the electorate on three options for increasing council tax levels for 1999/2000."

Returning to a point that I have already made during an intervention, let me point out that that referendum gave three options for increasing council tax levels. Bearing in mind the point that I made about clause 2(2), there could be at least three different outcomes and three different campaigns on that proposition. There could have been a fourth and a fifth option.

My local authority in Barnet has taken the Government's point of view to heart and has started to consult widely. There was wide consultation with the population on the council's draft budget. I am not sure whether that would count as a referendum, but my local authority is also experimenting with the use of electronic voting machines, citizens' juries and citizens' panels as part of that consultation process. I know from my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Coleman), who gave me a full briefing on those issues last night, that similar proposals are being discussed in Hammersmith.

My principal point is that the Bill lacks a definition of a referendum, and that is a problem. As things stand, clause 4(1) provides such a broad interpretation that all the possibilities to which I have referred could be taken into account by the Bill and local referendums could come under the influence of the proposed referendum commission, but is that a development that we should welcome?

Although we may want guidelines on the conduct of referendums in general to be laid down, I am concerned about the wide powers proposed by the Bill for the referendums commission to interfere in the conduct of referendums. I question whether it would be appropriate for a national body to get involved in the decision-making processes of a local referendum—for example, the setting of a question. I do not know how a national body could take on board all the relevant local factors; there may need to be sub-divisions or local referendum commissions if the national body is to have such wide scope.

In the context of grammar school ballots and local mayoral referendums, that issue also raises the question of fairness in the trigger arrangements, such as the petitions that could set off a grammar school ballot. I know from discussions with parents in my constituency that they are extremely concerned about the fairness of the arrangements for the trigger mechanism in respect of a ballot on grammar schools in Barnet. They think that those mechanisms are, to some extent, rigged against people who want grammar schools to be abolished, bearing in mind that substantial thresholds must be achieved to trigger a ballot. I question the Bill's current drafting. If it is to proceed, it should be redrafted to make it absolutely clear that it deals only with national referendums and that local referendums should not come into its scope.

My next concern relates to the powers proposed for the referendum commission under clause 1(5)(a), which refers to "the wording of any question to be put".

The right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) raised his concerns about the fairness of the questions for the London referendum. I shall return to that point in detail, and I am sure that hon. Members will be pleased to hear that. The right hon. Gentleman questioned whether the commission should have the power to be involved in the setting of the question.

Hon. Members will remember that there was extensive debate in the House on what the questions for the London referendum should be. The House came to a conclusion and voted on it. That conclusion formed part of the Greater London Authority (Referendum) Act 1998. The House decided what the question should be, so I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman was suggesting that the referendum commission should be in a position to overrule the Act of Parliament that set the question and impose a different question of its own, a series of questions or variations on the questions.

That serious point is not properly addressed by clause 1(5)(a) and comes into even sharper focus when we consider the possibility of a referendum of electoral reform. The Government have said that the referendum will have the first-past-the-post system as one option and a proportional representation system as the other. I remain an avid supporter of the first-past-the-post system and have yet to hear anything that would convince me otherwise. We know from the extensive public debate on PR and the full report produced by the Jenkins commission that there are a plethora of different solutions for electoral reform.

Let us suppose that the Government decided to propose a particular option for electoral reform as part of the process relating to the wording of the question and that the referendum commission decided that it preferred a different option. Would it be open to the referendum commission to interfere with the Government's suggested option and to suggest a different option?

Indeed, could the referendum commission second-guess the Government's position and allow the referendum to have not only the first-past-the-post system and one other option, but a series of options? In respect of clause 2(2), that opens the question of how many different campaigns could be undertaken. There could be a whole series of different campaigns and different outcomes. Presumably, all would qualify for public funds—an issue that the Bill fails to address.

I have another concern about clause 2(1). My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley was concerned about the timing of the referendum. I question the wording, which says that it would come into operation

"As soon as possible after the introduction to Parliament of any bill".

Opposition Members have made their position clear: they wold like to see the referendum campaign conducted fairly, above board and with no one feeling left out. The wording of clause 2(1) could lead to a premature decision about which campaign would be the favoured campaign. It very much favours the establishment.

We know that in the European campaign the sides are already lining up. Page 34 of the Library brief says:

"The pro and anti organisations have begun to mobilise. The Britain in Europe campaign, led by prominent business people, looks likely to be the main umbrella organisation for a Yes vote, while David Owen has agreed to lead the organisations likely to oppose a single currency, known as New Europe. This may not encompass all the views of those opposed to a single currency."

That is precisely my point. We have two relatively established campaigns on the European issue, but, as the public debate develops, and should a referendum Bill be introduced, other campaigns may be created. Those would have an equal right to be considered as the official campaign. Under the Bill, they would become disfranchised and the two establishment campaigns—not the Government campaign—would be left to slug it out among themselves. That would disfranchise people who are interested in single issues and who, to a large extent, feel excluded from the parliamentary process. I should be extremely concerned, therefore, if the wording of clause 2 were to stay as it is, as it suggests that the referendum campaign process should start as soon as possible after the enactment of the Bill, before the public debate on those issues had begun.

I am also concerned about clause 2(2), which lists as the criteria that should be taken into account

"the ability to conduct an effective campaign; the views of political parties; the degree of public support; and such other matters as the Commission considers relevant"— which is an open question. However, the clause gives no indication of the weighting to be given to each of those criteria. That is an important factor to take into account when deciding which body should be certified to run the campaign.

We heard earlier this morning about the problems that can arise when different parties within a campaign are dealing with other issues. The Europe campaign is a prime example. May I pray in aid the comments of the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), who is in the Chamber, during the debate on political parties funding on 9 November 1998? I find myself in a difficult position because, for the second time in three weeks, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The previous occasion was on the Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill. That is a strange position for me to be in and he may find it strange to have me on his side on this issue. He said:

"It is unnecessary and undesirable to require opponents to operate under one political umbrella, even if they support the same side on a political question. There are quite different ideological routes that might lead to the same case. That is obviously clear with the campaign that would emerge against the single European currency. It comprises a host of very different groups reflecting different ideological backgrounds. I believe that it would be a restraint on free speech to impose any sort of financial limit on those groups collectively."

Those groups would be handicapped if one side or the other within that debate were made the official campaign. In the same debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) made a similar point:

"I expect different people to have different points of view. In case the Whips are listening I point out that I declared in my general election manifesto: 'I shall vote against a single currency.'"—[Official Report, 9 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 104-07.]

My hon. Friend came to that conclusion by a different route from some Conservative Members on the Eurosceptic wing of their party. If we have the referendum campaign that has been promised if the Government decide that it would be wise to join the single currency, my hon. Friend may join the no campaign, but he will do so for different reasons and will put forward his views in different ways. If there is only one official campaign, it will be extremely difficult for both sides to express their views fully and fairly.

In a helpful intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley raised the issue of Northern Ireland. That is well highlighted in the Library brief that we have been given for this debate, which says:

"By contrast, in the referendum campaign the reasons for voting Yes or No may be exceedingly large in number, extremely disparate and possibly even contradictory. The Yes campaign in Northern Ireland, with the Ulster Unionists, the SDLP and Sinn Fein all on one side, and Republican splinter groups and the DUP on the other, provides a vivid illustration. Future referendum campaigns on electoral reform or on joining the European Economic Monetary Union could easily take the same form . . . Given this possibility, we believe that speaking to impose spending limits in referendums would not only be administratively impracticable but would, or at least might, impose an unwarranted restriction on freedom of speech."

Thus, the point is made in a number of different ways that various groups could be disfranchised under the Bill.

Similarly, the problem could arise if there are a number of different options. Earlier, I mentioned the London debate. Had the Opposition parties had their way, we would have had a complicated ballot paper and a series of different possible outcomes: there could have been one campaign against everything; one for a mayor only and no tax-raising powers; one for a mayor and tax-raising powers; one for an assembly only and no tax-raising powers; one for an assembly and tax-raising powers; one for an assembly, a mayor and tax-raising powers; and one for an assembly, a mayor and no tax-raising powers. That is seven possible outcomes and, under clause 2(2), seven possible campaigns. I question whether that would lead to a fair outcome. It would mean six parties working within the referendum supporting London government and only one campaign opposing all those options.

Therefore, the Bill would achieve exactly the opposite of what it is trying to achieve—equity and balance between the different sides in a referendum—because six different campaigns would be competing in favour of London government of some sort and only one would be opposed. The hon. Member for Blaby would say that that could not possibly happen. Looking at the Bill as a lawyer, I believe that, if I were representing one of those six options and found that my campaign would not be certified under clause 2(2), I would rush off to the law courts for a judicial review demanding my share of the action. We may find people with different viewpoints wishing to challenge the referendum commission by way of judicial review. People who get involved in referendums can be quite litigious and forceful in their views. They may wish to challenge the decision about which campaign should be supported.

Clause 3(1) brings into play the issue of funding and clause 3(2) that of broadcasting. My remarks on London very much bring that home.

Mr. Letwin: I shall not intervene for more than five seconds. As the hon. Gentleman is determined to speak for another 20 minutes, it would be helpful if he explained why he is bothering to filibuster the Bill rather than just continuing to witter endlessly to no purpose.

Mr. Dismore: I am not attempting to filibuster the Bill. When I began to read up on it, I became increasingly concerned about its wording. Sooner or later, if the Bill were to proceed, lawyers would come to construe it, and I see a minefield of detail from which my professional colleagues could make a huge amount of money. I am highlighting my concerns about the wording of the Bill and the enormous loopholes that it contains.

Mr. Robathan: I have listened attentively to the hon. Gentleman's absolutely fascinating comments. Has he been asked by any member of the Government to make as lengthy a speech as possible? I guarantee to ensure that he is on the Committee for the Bill, where he can make all his points at as much turgid length as he wants. Let me repeat my earlier warning to him that those who do the bidding of the Whips in a supine and feeble manner never achieve the respect of their peers, nor that of the Whips. Nor do they gain advancement.

Mr. Dismore: I am not making my speech with any view to advancement. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman now finds my remarks fascinating, having previously suggested that he found them boring. I must be winning him round with my cogent points.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Does my hon. Friend accept that many of us are listening to his speech with great interest? Many who support the general principle of a level playing field and more openness in the conduct of referendums also feel that the cumulative effect of the various defects and lacunae of the Bill mean that it should not be given a First Reading—[HON. MEMBERS: "Second Reading."] I apologise; I meant a Second Reading.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend succinctly makes the point that is the main thrust of my speech. I do not believe that we should not legislate on this matter: we should. However, we should do so comprehensively and in a thought-through way after having had the benefit of substantial public debate. We might, perhaps, take up the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley that we could have pre-scrutiny of a properly drafted Government Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) is quite right to say that the Bill is so full of holes that it will not hold water.

Mr. Robathan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dismore: I need to make some progress.

Mr. Robathan: Come off it.

Mr. Dismore: I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would want me to make some progress. I have given way to him several times already.

Mrs. Gorman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have long experience of the way in which the House conducts itself. The hon. Gentleman has been on his feet for more than 40 minutes, and many of us wish to contribute our views on the Bill. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman does not know that the civilised behaviour of the House requires that hon. Members should not abuse their opportunity to speak by keeping debate going longer than is necessary on issues that are not relevant to the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All the remarks made by the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) have been entirely in order.

Mr. Dismore: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Should I stray from the terms of the Bill, I am sure that you will quickly call me to order.

I was discussing funding before that batch of interventions. I was making a point about the severe distorting effect that a plethora of campaigns could have on funding if the Bill were enacted.

Clause 3(2) relates to broadcasting, and the same problem of possible disproportionality emerges there. There is also a risk of giving credibility to one or two dotty causes. During general election campaigns, broadcasts are awarded in proportion to the number of candidates standing for each party. That is right and proper, as it provides a rough reflection of possible support for the party in question.

I am concerned, however, that the Bill's reference to equivalent coverage may prove anti-democratic. It might give great credibility to an idea, perspective or point of view that frankly deserves little consideration. I share the objective of trying to achieve fairness, but fairness does not necessarily amount to equivalence. Fairness must reflect the broad terms of the debate, and, as I have already said about the European debate, equivalence of coverage for official campaigns—perhaps on Europe, perhaps on proportional representation—would create a strong chance that a disparate range of views could be disfranchised in the referendum process. People might not be able to put their point of view or say how and why they had come to it. They would not be able, perhaps, to influence people of similar views to vote in a particular way in a given referendum.

I should be very concerned if the broadcasting provisions in the Bill were to be enacted as phrased. They could have an effect opposite to that intended.

Mr. Stephen Twigg (Enfield, Southgate): When I read the Bill in preparation for the debate, it struck me that the second part of clause 3 is not only counterproductive, but unnecessary. It adds nothing to the existing requirement for balance and impartiality in current broadcasting legislation. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is so, and that it would be foolhardy of the House to add unnecessarily to legislation in this area when the existing framework is sufficient?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend, who has studied these issues carefully and written widely on electoral reform, makes a valid point. I am concerned about clause 3(2) because I believe it could have the opposite effect to that sought by the Bill's supporters. I return to what I said at the beginning of my speech: we need an election commission that can consider all the issues in the round and ensure that we have a consistent national policy for referendums and elections. That would provide a balanced approach, with nothing to suggest that anything was out of kilter.

The final part of my speech is perhaps the most important. It relates to my earlier interventions on the hon. Member for Blaby about what the Bill does not deal with and what it misses out. My starting point was the recommendations of the Neill committee, and funding in particular. The Bill deals in a fashion with public funding to provide core support for referendum campaigns, which would perhaps be uprated by comparison with that for the 1975 referendum on Europe, although I suspect that the uprated figures would in fact bear little relationship to the amounts that would be needed. The Bill is totally silent on some key recommendations of the Neill report—in particular recommendations 90, 91 and 92. Recommendation 90 states:

"Donations to campaigning individuals and organisations in referendums from one source which total £5,000 or more should be publicly disclosed in audited accounts which should be delivered to the Election Commission within three months of the holding of the referendum".

The Bill contains nothing about donations having to be declared.

Recommendation 91 is:

"Campaigning individuals and organisations other than political parties that wish to incur 'referendum expenses' of £25,000 or more, should register, like a political party, with the Election Commission. No individual or organisation not so registered may incur expenses in connection with a referendum in excess of £25,000".

Again, there is no mention of that in the Bill.

Recommendation 92 is:

"Campaigning individuals and organisations taking part in referendum campaigns should be restricted to the receipt of donations only from a 'permissible source'."

The report goes into detail on what permissible sources are. I do not propose to go into those, given the time constraints under which I am operating but, as has been pointed out, page 20 of the Library briefing, on the European campaign, states:

"There may be disparities of expenditure in the campaign on the single European currency, especially as the business man Paul Sykes has reportedly promised £20 million to the anti-euro campaign."

For a Bill on the supervision of referendums not to deal with that crucial issue of funding is a woeful omission. That issue goes to the heart of the democratic process. If Mr. Sykes is going to commit £20 million of his own money to that campaign without any restriction—without fear or favour—or control from the Bill, it will have a distorting effect on the process.

Mrs. Gorman: Surely the logic of the hon. Gentleman's remarks is that, if the Bill became part of the law of the land, people such as Mr. Sykes would not need to put up their hard-earned cash to ensure a fair campaign. Massive contributions of that sort could be excluded and I should think that Mr. Sykes and anyone with similar amounts of money would be delighted to keep that money.

Mr. Dismore: That is an interesting point. The limits on central Government support from public funds for the different campaigns are significantly lower than the sort of money that Mr. Sykes is talking about. The figures being bandied around are in the region of £600,000. I do not think one could mount much of a national campaign on an issue as important as the European referendum or the voting system for this place with such a sum. My argument is that it is not merely a question of core funding, with which the Bill deals to an extent, but of all the other party-funding issues raised by the Neill committee, which are transferred within the three recommendations from the Neill report to the context of referendums.

If we do not have open declarations of election funding and proper registration, we will be open to being hijacked by millionaires who want to promote their own political point of view. We saw the extent to which the late Sir James Goldsmith tried to influence the general election by setting up the Referendum party. He threw huge amounts of cash into the campaign to try to create a political process and, to an extent, influenced the election—the issue certainly came up on the doorstep far more than it might otherwise have done.

Unless we have restrictions of some sort on individual campaign donations I can see Mr. Sykes thinking, "With my business, I have a lot at stake as well as the country," and being more than happy to put up £20 million of his money because he can afford it to influence the outcome of that campaign. That crucial issue is not dealt with in the Bill in any way.

Finally, I shall deal with the Neill report and, most importantly, the role of Government, I am sure that you will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I asked the hon. Member for Blaby during his opening speech why the Bill was silent on that matter. He said that it was a matter for the referendum commission to consider. Frankly, that is not good enough. We have wide and diverse views on that issue. The hon. Gentleman suggests in promoting the Bill that the Neill committee would be the transitional referendum commission, unless and until something better happened along. Recommendation 89 of the Neill committee dealt with that point, stating:

"The government of the day in future referendums should, as a government, remain neutral and should not distribute at public expense literature, even purportedly 'factual' literature, setting out or otherwise promoting its case".

That is a fascinating comment. It is entirely at odds with the conclusions of the Jenkins commission on electoral reform—the independent commission on the voting system. Indeed, the Jenkins report came to the opposite conclusion. Paragraph 166 states:

"The representations have without exception placed strong emphasis on the need for a publicly-funded (and therefore impartially informative rather than partisan) civic education programme to prepare the general public for the decision they would be asked to make on the voting system which should follow this report."

Paragraph 168 seems to pray in aid the Neill committee, but perhaps does not help it, by calling for

"an independent body to oversee the conduct of referendums, although we think that the Government should be entitled to express its own view in any such referendum. It seems to us that an Electoral Commission would be best placed to discharge this role in relation to the referendum on the voting system."

Two eminent committees reached opposite conclusions on this crucial issue. The hon. Member for Blaby ducked that question, which is fundamental. A leading complaint of Opposition parties has concerned the extent to which the Government should be entitled to participate in referendum campaigns. The Bill's supporters rightly want to ensure that the debate is fair and above board. That demands a proper public information campaign. Electoral matters are complex. I have read about them and my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) has written a book on the subject. How are we to expect the public to form a view without explanations beyond the partisan?

Those of us who support first past the post argue our position vigorously, as do those who support electoral reform. Where is the point of view that puts the middle ground? Of all issues, the election of this Chamber demands a public information campaign, as recommended by Jenkins but apparently dismissed by Neill. The same applies to our possible entry to the euro. There are two diametrically opposed views with a plethora of different opinions within them. How are the public to sort the wood from the trees without a clear lead from the Government on the fundamental issues?

Since the general election, I have spent most weekends in my constituency knocking on people's doors and talking to them about the issues of the day, as I did before the election. Time and again, Europe comes up but it is not raised in an informed way. It tends to be, "We don't want the Germans, French or Italians telling us what to do," rather than detailed analysis of the crucial issues facing the British economy. It is incumbent on the Government to advance them.

Page 18 of the Library brief refers to the Good Friday agreement referendum in Northern Ireland, which was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross. The document states:

"The referendum on the Good Friday Agreement in Northern Ireland affords a different kind of example. The Government sent copies of the whole agreement to every household, but then, as a Government, confined itself to urging people to turn out to vote. Despite that, the Government made its position perfectly clear. Mr. Denis Murray, the BBC's Ireland correspondent, said in his oral evidence:

Mo Mowlam got the tone for the Government absolutely right. Somebody asked her, 'Are you biased in this?' She replied, 'I didn't spend five years on this and a year at Stormont, hammering it out, not to say I'm going to back this agreement.' She got the public mood exactly right. People said, 'Yes, that's fair enough.'"

It is wrong not to anticipate that the Government would have a point of view in advancing a referendum. It is important that the public has before it the facts, presented in a non-partisan way. If the only people entitled to campaign are those with a partisan view, the public cannot get that. I am amazed that the hon. Member for Blaby has ducked that fundamental question. It is not an easy question to answer. That is why two high-powered committees have different perspectives on it. I again pray in aid the helpful intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley. She suggested that there could be pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill on the subject. The issue could be explored in depth so that much stronger and better legislation came out at the other end of the process.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman has attempted to demolish the Bill, but it will be helpful to the House if we hear from him whether he takes the view not only that the issues are important—something that he has made clear—but that it is urgent that they be dealt with.

Mr. Dismore: I do regard the issues as important. That is why I have spent some time analysing them in detail. I believe that the Bill is fatally flawed, for the reasons that I have given. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that we need to get on with the matter. That is why I welcome the statement by the Home Secretary, which was emphasised by the Lord Chancellor in my quotation, that the Government propose to produce their draft Bill in the summer. That will enable time for pre-legislative scrutiny, perhaps through the autumn.

I should very much like to see a Bill introduced in the next Session of Parliament, but I shall not press my hon. Friend the Minister on that, because it is not for him to say what will or will not be in the Queen's Speech. I should like to see a Bill not only on referendums but on a series of other issues. If I had the difficult job of ranking Bills that the Cabinet faces, I am not sure that I would know which should come this year and which should come next year.

I certainly agree with the basic point that this is an urgent matter. I should like to see some progress on it, but I regret to say that the Bill does not provide the answers to some of the difficult points raised by the Neill committee and the Jenkins commission.

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): The hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) has given the game away, and in a very unsubtle manner. About 30 minutes ago, I was going to commend him on one thing only, and that was on his industry, and say that that would no doubt earn him brownie points from the Government Whips Office. He has gone about his speech in such a cack-handed manner that he has now exposed exactly what the operation is, and I do not think that he will get any brownie points. He has led us even to become suspicious of the Government's intentions. If this is how the Government tackle a debate such as today's, will they delay the legislation on referendums in exactly the same way? I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that a reputation for filibustering is not a good criterion for office.

The House knows that I was a member of the Neill committee, and still am, and was a member of the committee that drew up the report on political funding. I shall be very brief in my remarks because I have little time. I shall draw heavily on the Neill committee, but I also want to speak as a Member of Parliament. The first question is why the committee included a big chapter on referendums in the report. The issues and questions document on political funding that we originally issued did not treat referendums as a central issue. It was the almost universal evidence that we received from day one that led us to the view that referendums were a crucial matter and that committee had to address it.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on introducing the Bill, which he did in an admirable manner. He drew attention to what Peter Riddell said on day 1 of our evidence. It is worth quoting it again. He said that referendums had:

"massive implications, I think, for your exercise, for the way in which the political process operates, for fairness in funding and indeed for fairness in operation."

That comment was mirrored time and again subsequently, and it became clear that we had to address the issue.

It became clear as we went round the country, especially in Wales and Scotland, that the system used in recent referendums by the Government was seriously deficient and dangerously so. That was overwhelmingly evident. Almost everyone who gave evidence to us in Cardiff said that the way in which the Wales referendum was conducted was seriously deficient. There would not have been a no campaign if one member of the Labour party, Mrs. Carys Pugh, had not decided to go to her bank manager and ask for an overdraft of £4,000. She made that clear in her evidence to us.

Robert Hodge was so impressed by that that he gave a much larger sum—about £80,00—to the campaign. Overall, the no campaign had about £100,000, but the point is that nothing would have happened unless Mrs. Pugh had gone to a bank manager, whereas the yes campaign was backed by massive Government funding, far greater than anything that the no campaign could raise. No one can be certain whether that made a difference to the final result, but we know that the result was extremely close, so one wonders what the outcome would have been had there been fair funding. All of us on the committee were enormously impressed by the evidence that we received from everyone who contributed.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test): Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that occasionally it might be necessary artificially to create a campaign, so as to ensure that there are two sides in a referendum on any issue?

Mr. MacGregor: Of course I am not saying that. My point is that there must be a reasonable element of core funding for both sides. It is expensive to run a campaign and it was only Mrs. Pugh's courage in going to a bank manager that got the no campaign's funding off the ground. I cannot stress sufficiently strongly my belief that, for the sake of democracy and of giving a fair hearing to both sides in future campaigns, the implementation of proposals along the lines set out in the Bill and by the Neill committee is absolutely essential.

Because of the long filibuster that we have just heard, I shall confine myself to only a few points of detail. First, there is the referendums commission—or what members of the Neill committee would regard as the election commission detailed in our report. I fully understand why my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby has had to make that limited recommendation. He made it perfectly clear that he assumes that the referendums commission would be subsumed in the election commission set up when the full Bill on party political funding is finally produced and implemented. However, the reason for his having to propose a referendums commission in a Bill entirely dedicated to that subject is his concern, shared by many of us, that the Government will procrastinate on the issue. Clause 1(5) sets out a role for the referendums commission that is exactly like the role the Neill committee envisaged for the election commission. No doubt, it could be developed, but that can be done in Committee.

My second point relates to the crucial issue of core funding. I have already spoken about what happened in Wales, which is at the heart of my case. The Neill committee suggested a minimum of £600,000, but that was simply a figure derived from indexing what was spent on both sides during the 1975 campaign, and whether it is sufficient is a matter of argument. I think that that should be the minimum sum, and a reasonable argument could be made that it should be slightly more.

One or two people argued—I think the argument was made in the official evidence of the Labour party to the Neill committee—that political parties form the basis of campaigning in referendums. I do not agree, because it is fairly clear—it will be extremely clear in the two forthcoming referendums—that the issues cross parties. Therefore, it is essential to have national organisations that are recognised and registered by the election commission—or the referendums commission—as the organised bodies to which core funding should be paid. The one point on which I wholly agreed with the hon. Member for Hendon was in respect of first past the post; I just hope that he does not speak in any debate on first past the post, because he will absolutely ruin the case for it.

Core funding lies at the heart of the matter. I believe that the Bill could go further, because it does not positively state that core funding from taxpayers' resources will be made, but merely sets outs the conditions for such payments. It is essential that the Bill should state that that core funding will actually happen.

My next point goes beyond core funding, to other important issues. As in general election campaigns for election addresses, there should be compulsory free mailing for both sides in a referendum campaign. That should not extend only to a single document, as was done in 1975, if memory serves; it is right that both sides should be able to put out separate and individual free mailing. That is important because the cost of free mailing in general election campaigns is quite high. It is also important that correspondence is sent to every household in the country. I also believe that election broadcasts by both sides should be part of the process so that there may be communication through television.

Related to core funding is the question of disclosure and foreign donations. It would be sensible if the same principles governing party political funding in general elections were to apply to referendums. I foresee no difficulty in that regard.

The Home Secretary's views about the Government's role differ from those of the Neill committee. In previous debates, the Home Secretary has used that as an excuse for offering qualifications and for expressing reservations about the Neill recommendations.

Mr. Linton rose—

Mr. MacGregor: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman because he follows these matters carefully.

Mr. Linton: I had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman was about to move on to the question of funding limits. His convincing arguments about fairness in referendum campaigns—involving core funding, free mail and disclosure of donations—should lead to calls for funding limitations. It is possible for a referendum campaign to be unfair because one side is completely unfunded and must apply to the bank for a loan to set up the campaign. However, it is equally possible for a referendum campaign to be skewed unfairly because one side is funded disproportionately. There were spending ratios of 10:1 in the New Zealand campaign and 20:1 in the 1975 referendum campaign. The next referendum campaign on the single currency could be skewed the other way because donations have already been promised. Why did the Neill committee—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. Gentleman has made his point.

Mr. MacGregor: That was almost a speech. I did not intend to address that issue today as I am conscious that other hon. Members wish to contribute.

The Neill committee came to a conclusion about expenditure limits in referendums in paragraph 12.47 of the report, which states:

"Given this possibility,"—

we sought to differentiate between referendum and general election campaigns—

"we believe that seeking to impose spending limits in referendums would not only be administratively impracticable but would, or at least might, impose an unwarranted restriction on freedom of speech."

I agreed with that conclusion, which is why I offered a minority recommendation against expenditure limits in general election campaigns. Those are the sorts of arguments that the committee worked through, and I tend to agree with them. Real abuse occurs when a lot of Government funding goes to one side of the campaign and no public funding is available to the other side. That is why core funding is so important.

I return to the Home Secretary's comments about the role of Government, where I think there has been some misunderstanding in the past. In the debate on the Neill report, I pointed out that the wording of that report could have been better and more precise. I think Lord Neill also expressed that view in a letter to the Home Secretary.

The committee sought to avoid double funding by taxpayers of one side of the campaign. For example, if the majority of the Government were in favour of a yes vote in a particular campaign, we thought that it would be unfair if that case were to receive core as well as Government funding. We would never allow that to occur in a general election, and our recommendation addresses that anomaly.

Of course, Ministers should be free to campaign for a yes or no result, as they wish. That is made clear in the report, which says:

"We believe it is perfectly appropriate for the government of the day to state its views and for members of the Government to campaign vigorously during referendum campaigns".

It is important to emphasise that Ministers are perfectly entitled to campaign and, in my opinion, to use material from the civil service, in favour of a particular policy. That happens in general elections, because there is often civil service input in policy development. However, Ministers are not entitled to use Government resources during the campaign, such as using money to distribute leaflets that put only one side of the case, or using Government cars.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: No, time is short.

That is such a narrow point that the Home Secretary should not make anything of it by suggesting that the overall package put forward by Neill is flawed. There is no disagreement on that narrow point, so I hope that no more will be made of it.

My conclusion is that there has been strong universal support from many parts of the country for the Neill committee's recommendations on referendums. The Government, in their heart, believe that there is a fair case for those recommendations, and I hope that they will not try to continue to run the argument about Governments not being able to make known their views.

It is important that the Government state clearly in this debate what they intend to do. I strongly urge that their actions follow the lines of the Bill and the Neill recommendations. Above all—I very much agree with the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) on this point—there is much suspicion that the issue might drag on and arise late in the day before a referendum takes place—so, if the Government intend to filibuster on the Bill, I urge them to introduce legislation as quickly as possible.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): When the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) made the case for his Bill, he said that it was short and simple. In considering the Bill, we must ask whether it is adequate to deal with complex and wide-ranging issues. I have listened to the comments of several hon. Members, and it is clear that the issues are ones of principle and of significant detail.

Referendums will become increasingly important. We know that there is to be a referendum on joining economic and monetary union and we expect one on electoral change. Referendums are also likely to be held on devolution to the English regions. The Government are encouraging referendums for a wide range of activities relating to local government.

The principle of holding more and more referendums highlights the relationship between elected authorities and the people who elect them. It raises questions of the legitimacy of those referendums and of parliamentary democracy itself. I am sure that all hon. Members would agree that it is vital that referendums are conducted so that the results are credible and do not undermine elected authority. I am convinced that statutory regulation is required to achieve that. We must consider carefully the processes by which referendums take place and their results can be assessed. What we are considering today is whether the Bill, described by its promoter as short and simple, deals adequately with those important and fundamental issues of constitution and practice.

The major difficulty with the Bill is the scope of the referendums and the different types of decisions with which it is designed to deal, and the scope of the proposed referendums commission, which would deal with matters relating to economic and monetary union, electoral change, devolution and, presumably, local government referendums. It is clear that we are going to have more and more referendums in local government. Indeed, we are told that there may be legislation on that. The White Paper on local government reform referred to specific new legislation giving specific powers to local authorities to carry out more referendums. Is the Bill to supersede such legislation? Would it be compatible with it? Is it intended to embrace it? We simply do not know.

The question of local government legislation for referendums and the scope of future referendums is extremely important. The Government's stated policies envisage the Government themselves enforcing local government referendums on local authorities considering whether to change their structure. They envisage the public being able to trigger a referendum on having a directly elected mayor; they envisage compulsory referendums before a directly elected mayor can be installed; and they encourage referendums as tools of consultation on controversial local issues. Clearly, these are wide-ranging measures which encourage more referendums.

Dr. Whitehead: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as she seems about to say, the Bill is silent on the question of what might be termed citizens' propositions, whereby the local electorate can trigger referendums? It is also silent on how those propositions are put together in terms of signatures and how the appropriate wording might appear on the ballot paper. Would not that require regulation in itself?

Mrs. Ellman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. He makes an extremely important point. One of the deficiencies of the Bill is that, being simple and short, it does not deal with the complexities of the practical issues that are likely to arise.

The Bill's proposals on the role of the referendums commission ignore many fundamental issues. Should the same regulations and procedures apply for a referendum that is binding and for one that is simply advisory? Should the same recommendations and procedures apply for a referendum that could change national economic policy—for example, the decision to enter economic and monetary union—and one that expresses the view of a section of a local electorate about an issue on which a reversal of that referendum decision might be possible?

In other words, should a binding decision on electoral change, EMU or regional devolution equate to a referendum taking a view on a proposal about local car parking restrictions? They are fundamentally different issues, and the respective referendums must vary in force and importance. However, the Bill does not distinguish between those issues; indeed, it does not consider them at all.

There are other matters of concern relating to the Bill—matters of concern because of their omission. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) have each detailed those issues in their own way. The matters raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon are of great importance, and I refer hon. Members to them.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk drew attention to some very important issues, and in doing so highlighted the fact that the Bill does not reach any conclusions about them. They include matters to do with financial rules on the conduct of referendums and to do with the question of when a referendum campaign has begun. Has a referendum campaign on economic and monetary union started already?

The Bill does not ask questions about proper public access to information. It does not consider whether there should be free airtime for competing viewpoints, access to free public rooms or free mail—issues considered by the Neill committee.

The Bill does not consider the proper remit for the commission. It does not look at other related issues of importance, such as the idea of a rolling electoral register. It does not consider very important issues concerning the relationship between the referendum commission and the constitution unit of the Home Office, which is also involved in these matters.

Therefore, many crucial aspects are omitted from the scope of the Bill. The House should not be asked to approve a Bill of fundamental importance, relating to an area that will become increasingly important, until those issues have been considered. They are not simply issues of detail; they have, and will increasingly have, great significance.

All the matters that have been mentioned in the debate are of great importance and complexity, and require thought and consultation. That is why a Bill that has been described by its promoter as short and simple is inadequate to deal with those important and fundamental matters.

It would be far preferable for the Government to come up with a proposal and to allow widespread consultation on all those important issues. Pre-legislative scrutiny might be a consideration, but it is important that the House has the opportunity to consider documentation that sets out all those important issues, which touch the heart of our constitution, and that proper public consultation is undertaken on all those matters before a decision is taken.

We are considering issues of public importance—and growing importance. We are considering issues to do with the legitimacy of government and the credibility of the results that will emerge from, no doubt, a growing number of referendums. Those matters deserve deeper thought than the Bill permits. For that reason, the Bill is deficient and should not be allowed a Second Reading today.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on introducing this immensely important Bill, and doing so in a very stylish way. The Bill relates to an issue of fundamental importance to the way in which we are now governed, given the Government's appetite for referendums on many different issues, all of them in a pre-legislative form.

I was most interested to note that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) said that, since my hon. Friend had described his Bill as short and simple, it could not deal adequately with the complex issues raised in the debate. I remind the hon. Lady that "short" and "simple" are two of the three words that the Leader of the House has used to describe the Government's House of Lords reform Bill. Presumably, given that description, the hon. Member for Riverside believes—by her own logic—that the Government are dealing inadequately with the complexities of House of Lords reform in that Bill.

Mrs. Ellman: Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that the description given by the Leader of the House concerned the first phase of House of Lords reform? The proposal is indeed short and simple, but there is to be full consultation. A commission is sitting at this moment, considering the detailed complexities of what is to follow.

Dr. Fox: That is definitely a case of when the accused should opt for the right to silence.

This debate has been a test of the Government's democratic credentials. It has been a chance for them to prove that, as they have always said, they want a fair and equitable democratic system. We all know for our experience in this House exactly what is happening today. The Government have decided—it is in their power to do so—that this Bill should not be given a Second Reading. Labour Members have attempted to filibuster, although the quality has been fairly poor. It is a great pity that the Government have decided not to accept the fairly reasonable Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby.

This Bill is part of a wider debate. In this Parliament, we are experiencing a battle between democratic man and Executive man, in which Executive man is increasingly taking the upper hand. I am disappointed that some Labour Members have rolled over in the face of the Executive's desire. In doing so, they have not only failed to defend the rights of Parliament, but have allowed the Government to extend Executive power beyond both Houses of Parliament into areas such as how people can speak in a referendum. I find that an extremely disturbing trend.

Let us be clear about the intention behind the Bill: it is that referendums should be conducted fairly. The Bill asks for fairness in setting the question, so that the Government are not allowed to set a question that suits them. I can imagine the sort of objective question that the Prime Minister might set on economic and monetary union: "Well, I'm a great sort of guy, and if maybe I can come up with the right sort of solution at some point in the future, do you think maybe I should be given the chance to accept it if I think the timing is right?" We want a separate body to set a fair and objective question.

We want fairness in the timing of referendums, so that no one group is favoured. The hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) told us, in an answer that would have made Pravda proud, that the Welsh and Scottish referendums were staggered because there was a media deficit in Wales. Apparently, that does not apply to the elections for the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Parliament—the Scots and the Welsh are apparently now quite capable of distinguishing which country they live in.

We want fairness in the funding of referendums. We believe that both sides of the argument should have reasonable access to funding, so that the disadvantage in the Welsh referendum, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) referred, does not recur. There should be fair access to the media. In this day and age, when the broadcast media matter so much, it is essential to the democratic process that both sides in a referendum campaign, just as in a general election, are given equal access and equal air time.

Judy Mallaber: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there should be a limit on the amount of money that either side can spend on a referendum campaign? Does he believe that such a limit should be in the Bill? I understand why he is supporting the Bill—I support its principles—but does he not agree that a Bill that covered other issues, such as funding, would be preferable?

Dr. Fox: Those are valid questions for consideration in Committee. Maximum levels of funding should be considered in Committee. We want an urgent response to the problem that we face. The Government would have no problem if they allowed this Bill, with its limited provisions, a Second Reading, and then introduced a wider Bill to cover its functions. It would be entirely possible to repeal this Bill.

Why have Labour Members decided that they do not want this Bill to become law? They have done so because of the will of the Executive, not of Parliament. The Executive ask, "Why should we give anything away when we might be able to use it to our advantage?" That is the worst aspect of the way in which we are governed.

We must ask is why we need fairness. The overriding reason is that the legitimacy of any referendum result requires validity. In Wales the legitimacy was questioned because there was a 0.6 per cent. majority on only a 50 per cent. turnout. That occurred after the Government had used public money—by definition, from those who support both sides of the debate—for Government propaganda. The case put forward was not objective—it was the Government's case.

In this country, not only is no threshold set for a referendum to give it validity, but we have no numerical barriers in our Parliament to changes to our constitution. Results such as that in Wales can therefore lead to questions about validity. That is the wrong basis for making any form of constitutional change, and we should all be deeply worried about it.

What if we get a referendum on electoral reform, and what if that system is entirely dependent on a tiny proportion in a low turnout? What would be the validity of the result? That is why we require a referendums commission.

The Government have shown their fondness for pre-legislative referendums. There is a difference in legitimacy between the results of a pre-legislative referendum and a post-legislative referendum. In a pre-legislative referendum, the people have an idea of what principles they are voting for. In a post-legislative referendum, they know what legislation they are supporting. There can be a world of difference between the two.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) is no longer in his seat. His points were entirely based on the concept of legitimacy. As he raised the issue of the current fair British voting system, as against the gerrymandering proposed in other quarters, I would ask him to consider the proposition that a post-legislative referendum would be a far fairer basis for such plans.

Apart from the potential electoral reform referendum, there is concern about the way in which the Government are spending money on the so-called national changeover plan, which is actually the national handover plan, for economic and monetary union. We must make sure that a firm and equitable basis for conducting a referendum is in place before we ever conduct a referendum on electoral reform, and before we conduct a referendum on the most constitutionally important step this side of 1066—the economic and monetary union referendum.

We must have fair rules. The Bill would go some way to achieving that. The Minister will no doubt tell us not to worry, as the Government will put some measure in place. We will have draft legislation. We can have pre-legislative scrutiny. We will get a vague timetable, but we will be given no firm assurances.

[Dr. Fox]

If the Government's democratic credentials mean anything at all, the Minister will give us an assurance, with the authority of the Government and the specific authority of the Prime Minister, that no referendum on any constitutional change will be introduced in Parliament without a body having first been established to determine objectively the question, the timing, the funding and the media access to referendums in this country.

If the Minister can give us that assurance, my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby has reasonably said that he will not press his Bill any further. If the Minister fails to give us such an assurance, he will boost our fear of the Government's motives. He will boost among the many cross-party groups that supported the Bill the suspicion that the Government are out to concoct a system that suits the Labour party's interests, not the national interest. That is what we have seen from them before, and what we suspect we will get in future.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): I am prepared to accept that the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) tabled the Bill in an altruistic spirit. He seems to be good-humoured individual. I am prepared to accept that, although there is a battle raging within the ranks of the official Opposition on the role of Britain in Europe and on the single currency, the hon. Gentleman's main motive, if not that of his colleagues, in pursuing the Bill has nothing to do with the anti-European stance of many within his party, but has to do with a fundamental democratic issue, which all those who are interested in democracy and fair play should recognise—the need for a level playing field and a fair and open regulatory system for the conduct of referendums.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas rose—

Mr. Gareth Thomas: I give way to my hon. Friend. It is always a pleasure to give way to my namesake.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: Does my hon. Friend think it a shame that the official Opposition spokesperson did not have the courage to take a few more interventions? Does he think also that it is a little rich for Conservative Members to be asking questions about our democratic credentials when they opposed any attempt to establish the equivalent of the Neill committee at a much earlier stage?

Mr. Gareth Thomas: My hon. Friend raises a significant point with which, he will not be surprised to learn, I agree wholeheartedly.

As I have said, I am prepared to give the hon. Member for Blaby the benefit of the doubt. I agree with the valid points made by the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor). However, the Bill contains many defects and lacunae, and in my view should not receive a Second Reading. I recognise that the Bill addresses a fundamental issue. That being so, it should have been thought through in a fundamentally sound manner. There should be full consultation with the public and all interested groups. The Bill is premature and precipitate. Much more work has to be done on it. The devil is in the detail, and I shall take up some of the detail of the Bill, or, rather, the lack of detail, which causes me concern.

I express my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore). Although he was unfairly criticised by some Conservative Members, he did the House a favour in his comprehensive analysis of the problems and defects associated with the Bill. My hon. Friend mentioned that there is no upper limit on the spending that could be brought to bear by designated referendum campaigns. That is a fundamental defect. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk said that, in some way, such a limit would cut across the grain of the right to freedom of speech.

However, if the main motive behind the Bill is to ensure a competitive environment for a referendum campaign, an upper limit is essential in the interests of fair play.

Dr. Whitehead: Does my hon. Friend accept that we do not need to look into a crystal ball on this point? I have in mind what has happened over the years in America, particularly in the holding of local and state referendums. The proportional difference in spending between one side and the other, especially when business spending is involved, goes up to 200:1, despite whatever the state may do to apply fair funding and fair information between both sides.

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend raises a fundamental point. Many Labour Members could be forgiven for thinking that the fact that there is no upper limit in the Bill gives the lie to the suggestion that it is an entirely altruistic measure designed to combat the perceived democratic deficit.

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): I have a great deal of sympathy with the argument for an upper limit. However, everything that the hon. Gentleman has said so far suggests that he should be a member of the Committee that amends the Bill to fill the lacunae to which he has referred. His proposed alternative—that the Bill should not receive a Second Reading—does not follow on from what he has said.

What is the implication of delaying the passage of a referendum Bill through the House when one of the major referendums that this country will face—as my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) said—will be on joining monetary union? The Government are already spending large sums on what the Neill report referred to as putatively factual information. How does the hon. Gentleman deal with that problem—the idea that delay will influence one of the most important referendums that is coming up?

Mr. Thomas: Although I agree with many of the principles of, and some of the concepts behind, the Bill, we must none the less take a detailed approach to the drafting of such legislation. My view is that the cumulative effect of the defects and the lacunae is that the Bill should not receive a Second Reading. Over and above that, if a fundamental measure of this sort is to be considered by the House, full consultation on all its details, and with all interested parties, is essential. That has to be undertaken before such legislation reaches the statute book. I hope that that answers the right hon. Gentleman's point.

May I deal with some other lacunae in the Bill? As I have said, there is no upper spending limit, and there is no definition of what constitutes a referendum, which is a startling omission. I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon said: that could cause all manner of difficulties. The Bill could be a charter for lawyers, because it raises innumerable questions about what constitutes a referendum. It would cause complications over the freedom that the Government may wish to give to local authorities to conduct ballots, to establish citizens' juries or to ask questions of local electorates on matters of concern within local communities.

The Bill contains no details of how the referendum commission would operate. In my view, it should have a far more wide-reaching brief than the Bill suggests. I would favour an electoral commission charged not only with ensuring fair play in the conduct of referendums but with raising public awareness and enhancing public participation in elections generally. I believe that the Government would support that proposal.

Another of the Bill's defects is the absence of a reference to what should be the permitted role of the Government. Much of the debate has turned on that important point, and my view is that the Government of the day have a responsibility to raise public awareness. Indeed, the Government should use public money to enhance public awareness on matters of constitutional importance, such as the Welsh and Scottish referendums. I shall discuss those referendums, as well as the European single currency, in a moment.

The case for using public money is all the greater if the printed press is inclined to give a one-sided view of a case. It is essential that the Government be allowed to put their case, but the Bill does not refer to what their role should be. I believe that their role should be defined. Many Conservative Members have said that it would be wrong for the Government of the day to enter the arena overmuch, and I accept that point. There should be some control over the manner in which the Government generate information; it should not be propaganda, but, on the other hand, the Government have the important duty of raising public awareness.

I agree that practical difficulties are associated with the operation of designated referendum campaigns, and problems could also be caused by the Bill's broadcasting provisions. As has been said, it could be strongly argued that the current regulatory framework for broadcasters covers the position sufficiently, without further legislation being required.

May I deal with the position in Wales? As a Welsh Member and someone who was actively involved in the Welsh referendum campaign, I have a particular interest in that matter. Although the result of the referendum for setting up the National Assembly for Wales was close, it was none the less a victory for the yes camp. The Government should be congratulated on moving forward speedily with legislation to set up a democratic tier of government in Wales. It is well overdue and is a recognition of the national status of Wales within the British unitary state.

The problem in Wales arose because of the nature of the topography and the fact that Wales does not have a national printed newspaper. Moreover, many people in Wales either cannot, or choose not to, receive television or radio signals from Welsh channels. That creates the problem that I described in an earlier intervention. The hon. Member for Woodspring did not seem to accept my argument, perhaps because, with the greatest respect, he does not have sufficient knowledge of conditions in Wales. I advise him strongly to listen to some of his Welsh Assembly candidates, who will say that there is a media deficit in Wales. We do not have a national newspaper like the one that exists in Scotland. Right up until polling day for the Welsh referendum, many people did not understand that there was to be a referendum or what it would mean. In those circumstances, the Government had a duty to hold a public information campaign supported by public money—indeed, it would have been an abdication of their responsibility had they not done so.

Dr. Fox: Most of what the hon. Gentleman has said is nonsense, but surely he agrees that the logic of his argument is that both sides of the argument should have been presented to all the electors in Wales, rather than just one side, supported by public money.

Mr. Thomas: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman adopted a churlish tone in dismissing what I would like to think is an objective contribution to this valuable debate. Incidentally, I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaby on raising this issue. The Government did not overstep the mark in Wales. The information that was delivered to each doorstep in Wales was objective. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Woodspring and I will have to agree to disagree. My view is that the Government had a role to play in Wales. Given the lack of public awareness of issues surrounding devolution, they had a duty to step in and fill the media deficit.

We can learn from the results of the referendum in Wales. In terms of the yes and no votes, there was not a north-south split, but an east-west split. The west of Wales, which one might regard as the Celtic fringe—it certainly covers the more Welsh areas of Wales in terms of language and place of birth of the majority of the inhabitants—recorded large majorities in favour of an assembly, whereas the east, including parts of my constituency, recorded an equally large number of votes against devolution.

One can read many things into that, as one can with all referendums, which is why many people believe that they can be an unsatisfactory and inaccurate way of gauging public opinion. Many people in Wales believed that the result of the referendum reflected the degree to which people felt an affinity with the Welsh culture and nation. It may not have had as much as it should have to do with the fine detail of the democratic argument in favour of—or for that matter against—an assembly. However, it was necessary for the Government to invest money in educating the public.

When we have a referendum on the European single currency, the Government will have a similar duty to provide dispassionate information to the general public on the merits and demerits of joining the single currency, if only to counteract what may transpire to be the xenophobia that will emanate from many sources, not least some elements of the press.

Mr. Robathan: I do not want to detain the hon. Gentleman, as I should like other hon. Members to have a chance to speak. He has twice said that the Government have a duty to inform people, but he has also said that he will oppose the Bill. The Bill is about allowing people to make informed choices. Each side of the argument will be presented to everyone so that they can understand what it is that they are being asked to vote for. If only one side of the argument is given, how can anyone make an informed choice?

Mr. Thomas: I entirely agree with the principle that the public should hear both sides of the argument, delivered loud and clear. I should like there to be upper limits on spending so that fairness exists and so that the voice of parties to the arguments can be heard in equal proportion. However, there are fundamental problems with the Bill, and I cannot accept it.

Much has been made of the fact that the no campaign in Wales, which was poorly financed and resourced, achieved quite a degree of success. Most political parties in Wales—with the notable exception of the official Opposition—were in favour of the establishment of the National Assembly for Wales; it was an important commitment in the Labour, Liberal Democrat and Plaid Cymru general election manifestos. My own view is that there ought not to have been referendums in either Scotland or Wales because devolution was clearly a fundamental principle at the heart of the general election campaign. There was a stark division in both Scotland and Wales between the Conservatives and Labour on that principle.

The role of broadcasters during the referendum campaign in Wales was problematic. Broadcasters must give a balanced view of both yes and no campaigns, but they must surely be entitled also to give weight to the strength of opinion. To create an artificial balance would be completely wrong-headed. All political parties in Wales—except the Conservatives—supported devolution. It was artificial to allow the no campaign so much coverage when it had little support outside certain areas. Points made this morning about the Bill's problematic broadcasting provisions have highlighted a fundamental defect in the Bill.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaby on introducing an important Bill that deals with issues which the Government should comprehensively address. I hope that they will do so in the near future, because those issues go to the root of our democratic system. However, I cannot accept the Bill as it stands.

1.10 pm

Mr. David Davis: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand from the news that the hon. Member for Newark (Mrs. Jones) has been found guilty in the election expenses-rigging trial. Have you received any notification from the Government that there will be a by-election?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): I have had no notification of a statement.

1.10 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I, too, add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on producing this important Bill, which is based on the well-researched Neill committee report and which had all-party support and should therefore be given a fair wind in the House—there is no excuse for not doing so.

In passing, I must inform the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) that hon. Members who are prepared to act as the Government's pooper-scoopers rarely come up smelling of roses when it comes to promotion. The hon. Gentleman illegitimately took up almost an hour of the House's time to pour out a lot of nonsense—he knew it was nonsense—in the hope of doing deals with his Front Bench.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) said, we could be forgiven for thinking that the Government do not intend to introduce any fairness into the system in time for the referendum that they have promised after the next general election, if they happen to win it. We will have a referendum if we win the election. The Government are deliberately delaying introducing that fairness because they do not want it for that referendum. As has been remarked, they are already pumping money into their side of the debate. That is why we are here this morning. We are trying to allow the people of this country to have a legitimate say in a matter that is of crucial importance to our future democracy and independence.

I had intended to raise two issues, but as one was partly dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox)—what I would have called the thresholds involved in a referendum and what he calls the legitimacy of outcome—I will move on to the second in the interests of brevity.

That issue is the scope of referendum, and we may deal with it in Committee. We need to define to some extent the issues that could legitimately qualify for Government support. As the hon. Member for Hendon remarked, ballots of parents concerning a school would clearly be outwith the scope of any legislation dealing with referendums, which should be held on matters of national importance—issues that should be the concern of every citizen at the time of the referendum.

The question of who is to be balloted in a referendum is another issue. I mention that because, in the recent past, there have been a number of referendums dealing with matters of fundamental importance to the whole population—the future of the legitimate structure of the United Kingdom—in which voting has been restricted to certain parts of the country. Had even all those of Scottish birth been given the right to vote in the Scottish referendum, we might have had a different outcome—and that will not have escaped the Government's attention. The point of that referendum was not to take note of public opinion but to achieve the political objective of the Government of the day.

The same was true in Wales where, as has been pointed out on a number of occasions, the turnout was extremely low—that is relevant to the question of the threshold that should be allowed. In the London referendum, the turnout was derisory. However, the Government now legitimately claim that they have a mandate to go ahead with a new form of administration and, again, they have a political motive. The Government know full well that the central part of our capital city sensibly returns Conservative councils such as Westminster—despite all the abuse and concoctions of the Labour party to discredit it—and Kensington and Chelsea. Though we do not know this from elections, I suggest that the City of London would be Conservative. If we tack on Wandsworth, we have a core in the centre of London likely to remain predominantly Conservative. The Government's actions are designed to undermine that position.

That brings me to the electorate in referendums and the Government's intention to exclude certain parts of the country from the overall game plan. Most particularly, that means the people of England. They, too, have a legitimate case, under the Government's criteria, to be asked whether they want a government to handle domestic issues that affect people who live in England and no other—a government of the sort that the Scots, and, to a large extent, the Welsh, will have.

Mrs. Ellman: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Gorman: I want to make progress. The hon. Lady has made her speech and others want to contribute.

I challenge the Government to say why people in England are not to be afforded the same courtesy and democratic right accorded to other parts of the United Kingdom. Several people who have written to me about this tell me that they also write to the Prime Minister, only to be told that there is no real interest in the issue. That is not a legitimate reason for excluding the people of England, because the referendums have presented them with an anomalous situation. Major domestic concerns such as health and education and welfare will be decided by separate Parliaments in Scotland and Wales, but Scottish and Welsh representatives will be free to vote on such issues as they affect the people of England. I hope that that will be at the forefront of deliberations in Committee.

The outcome of all this should fair to all citizens. So far, the Government's referendums have been anything but. They have been politically motivated and exclusive and do not qualify as legitimate consultation of the people. Polls are one thing, but matters likely to affect the construction of the United Kingdom are for general elections. The Government would say that they brought those things up in their manifesto and that they are therefore legitimate.

When the Government ballot the people of the United Kingdom through referendums on issues fundamental to all parts of the United Kingdom, the process should include all the peoples of the United Kingdom. We have gone past that stage for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, but we can still accord the same fairness and courtesy to the people of England. If the Government are not prepared to do that, and continue to hold the people of England in contempt, there will be a repercussion. The people who represent the people of England in this Chamber will surely not stand by and continue to allow those who are not elected as English Members to the Westminster Parliament to determine matters of fundamental importance to the people of England. I hope that fairness and legitimacy will be to the fore in the Committee's discussions.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): As other hon. Members on both sides of the House have said, fair rules on referendums and elections are clearly an important issue. However, Opposition Members should be extremely wary of using words such as "democracy" and "fairness". My constituents remember only too well that the Conservative party refused to extend the remit of the Nolan committee to consider political party funding.

I am slightly surprised to see so many members of the Conservative party supporting a referendums commission in the light of the evidence that Lord Parkinson gave on its behalf to the Home Affairs Select Committee. The Committee noted that he was not convinced that an electoral commission was necessary or, indeed, that it would be desirable. It seems a remarkable volte-face, so soon after he gave that evidence, that so many Conservative Members should now support the Bill.

I fear that the Bill was born of the Conservative party's hysteria on all matters to do with the euro and their opposition to any future sensible attempts to modernise our electoral system. It is a badly drafted Bill that raises more questions than it answers. Therefore, I will not support it or urge the Government to support prolonging its life. Nevertheless, I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) on securing such a high slot in the private Member's ballot and on the way, albeit misguided, in which he set out his case.

The background to the Bill lies in our party's decision to extend the remit of the Nolan Committee on Standards in Public Life. One of the most important recommendations made by the Neill committee was for the establishment of an elections commission. Recommendation 93 of its fifth report states that one function of such a commission should be to keep referendums and referendum campaigns under review, and that reports should be made to the Government and to Parliament about them.

In the debates on 9 November on the Neill committee's fifth report, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary clearly stated his intention "to produce a draft Bill before the next summer recess and to bring forward legislation so that new rules can be in place for the next general election."—[Official Report, 9 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 53.]

The hon. Member for Blaby said in answer to my intervention that an elections commission would take over the role of a referendums commission. In the light of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's assurance, a referendums commission is entirely unnecessary, since legislation to establish a much more crucial elections commission, with a role in referendums but with even more fundamental responsibilities, will come before the House.

In the concluding part of his speech on 9 November, the shadow Home Secretary said, or at least claimed, that he wanted to see legislation

"that covers all the report's proposals, for referendums as well as elections."—[Official Report, 9 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 66.]

Yet here is the Conservative parliamentary party turning out in force to support a proposal that is not in the Neill report—indeed, much of it flies in the face of what he recommended—and does not cover the bigger picture of elections.

[Mr. Gareth R. Thomas]

Clauses 2 and 3 relate to the need for equal access to core funding to enable at least minimal campaigns to be mounted by designated pro and anti campaigns. Yet, in paragraph 12.35 of the fifth report, the committee states unequivocally:

"We believe that the new Election Commission should be the body both to receive applications for core funding from organisations intending to campaign in any referendum and to decide which of the organisations should be in receipt of the core funding."

The report mentions an elections commission, not a referendums commission.

The question in my mind is why the hon. Member for Blaby, backed by so many of his hon. Friends, is proposing a referendums commission and not an elections commission. I suspect that the Conservative party fears an elections commission. It fears the honesty, transparency and integrity that a commission would demand of all political parties. The Conservative party was most reluctant to see lasting reform of party funding. The former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), consistently opposed extending the remit of the Nolan committee to party funding.

What is particularly astonishing about the Bill is the absence of a broader regime of controls recommended by the Neill report, which, over a defined period, would require the registration of any campaigning group or individual intending to incur expenditure of more than £25,000.

The Bill contains no requirement to report donations of more than £5,000 to campaigning individuals or groups. Where is any restriction on the source of donations to campaigning organisations? Specifically, why does the Bill not at least ban foreign donations? The omission of such controls has an echo in the Conservative party's reluctance to accept tighter controls on, and tighter scrutiny of, election spending. Who could forget the extent to which the Conservative party was reliant on foreign donors at the last election? There was the £1 million gift from a Hong Kong businessman, and £1.5 million from a Greek shipping owner, not to mention the Asil Nadir debacle. At the time, the Conservative party was desperate for money—any money—to try to buy election success or, more realistically, to minimise—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going a bit wide of the Bill.

Mr. Thomas: Thank you for your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Dismore: Perhaps I can help out my hon. Friend by reminding him of the suggestion that Paul Sykes might make a contribution of up to £20 million to a no campaign in the European referendum. Does that help to illustrate my hon. Friend's point?

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I was asking why the Bill contains no ban on foreign sources of funding for referendum campaigns. Is it because, as I suspect, the hon. Member for Blaby and his right hon. and hon. Friends want to ensure that a treasure chest can be built up to buy advantage at any price in a referendum on entry to the euro, or to fight any form of sensible electoral reform?

The omission of references to the need for disclosure of the sources of funding, which was recommended by Neill not only for elections but for referendums, reminds me of the improper close relationship that existed between those who funded the Conservative party and those who held power in it, as described in Lord McAlpine's biography. Any referendum campaign must avoid such stigma, or even the hint of it, especially as the campaigns in the possible referendums on entry to the single currency and on electoral reform would inevitably be fronted by high-profile political or business figures. Without rules on disclosure and the source of donations, and thus without transparency and accountability, there will always be concern about the nature of the relationship between funders and funded in a referendum campaign.

The hon. Gentleman made much of the need for broadcast media to give equal access to both sides in a referendum campaign. I do not see what his Bill adds to existing legislative requirements, as broadcasters are already required to be impartial in their coverage of matters of political controversy. Another example of bad drafting is the absence from the Bill of a requirement for the commission to account for the expenses it incurs. Neither is it clear, either from the Bill or from the speeches in support of it, how the establishment of a permanent body dealing solely with referendums can be reconciled with the fact that referendums are, by definition, infrequent.

There is one other major omission from the Bill, which is any limit on the spending allowed during a referendum. The Neill report's recommendations that there should not be curbs on referendum expenditure are fundamentally flawed. The committee advanced two arguments for allowing any amount of spending. First, it argued that referendum campaigns are often fought by people and organisations who have never worked together, or who might not work together even during the campaign, and that it would thus be impractical to try to control campaign spending. I recognise the additional complexity that referendum campaigns bring, but I do not accept that control is impossible. The issue is one that an elections commission should explore in more detail.

The second argument against control over spending advanced by the Neill committee is that it would result in some sort of unwarranted restriction of freedom of speech, because the reasons for voting yes or no might be large in number, disparate, and even contradictory. The same conflicts exist during election campaigns, with the number of such conflicts reflecting the number of parties contesting the election. Therefore, if there should be constraints on spending during election campaigns, there should also be limits on spending during referendum campaigns.

I am extremely suspicious of the motives of Conservative Members who back the Bill. The Bill selectively picks out recommendations from the Neill committee report, it does not address key criticisms of the report and it completely ignores the need for more wide-ranging reform of our election system. That wide-ranging reform is necessary, in part to clean up and guarantee as far as is possible a continuing clean relationship between the Conservative party and its funders.

I think that this Bill is really about trying to secure an advantage for the Conservatives' position in a referendum campaign on the euro. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that he has been rumbled, that he will withdraw his Bill immediately and engage instead in a more mature and genuine debate about the rules governing both electoral and referendum campaigns when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary publishes draft legislation this summer.

1.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): I join other hon. Members who have congratulated the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) not only on his success in the ballot, but on raising this important issue. It has given the House a welcome opportunity to debate several important points regarding the conduct of referendums. I also thank the hon. Gentleman for the good-humoured way—for the most part—in which he introduced his Bill and for his courteous comments about me.

As many hon. Members have said, the case for a generic referendums Bill is clearly stronger now than it was 10 years ago. As several hon. Members recounted, since 1973 eight referendums have been held either throughout the United Kingdom or, more commonly, in a particular part of the country. Some might find it surprising, given the subsequent history of referendums, that it was a Conservative Government who conducted our first referendum in 1973 on whether Northern Ireland should continue to remain part of the United Kingdom.

That was followed by three referendums under the last Labour Government. The first of those, in June 1975, was on the United Kingdom's continued membership of the European Community. It remains, to date, the only occasion on which a referendum has been held throughout the country. It is worth recording that the Neill committee saw the legal and administrative arrangements for the 1975 referendum as a model for future nationwide polls. There followed, in 1979, separate referendums in Scotland and Wales on whether the devolution legislation, enacted the previous year, should be put into effect.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) pointed out, the conduct of referendums fell into disuse during the 18 years of the previous Conservative Administration. However, the Labour Government were elected with a commitment to making some sweeping changes to this country's constitution, and we believe that key parts of that programme of constitutional change should be underpinned by the explicit consent of the people affected. To this end, we have already held four referendums. The first two, in 1997, sought the endorsement—which we received—of our proposals for devolved government in Scotland and Wales. They were followed, in 1998, by referendums in London and on the establishment of the Greater London authority and in Northern Ireland on the acceptability of the Good Friday agreement respectively.

However, as most speakers have conceded, the use of referendums will probably not stop there. Our manifesto contains a number of further commitments to hold referendums at an appropriate time. Last month, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, when launching the national changeover plan, reiterated our commitment to hold a referendum on membership of the single currency after a Government decision to join. In addition to the euro, we have also said that we will hold a referendum before changing the voting system for elections to this House and before introducing directly elected regional government in England. The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) referred to England as one region or nation. As she well knows, the Government have no plans to introduce an English Parliament, although any demand for some sort of regional government will be pursued via a referendum in the area concerned.

Our commitment to referendums to strengthen the democratic legitimacy of our new constitutional settlement is not confined to changes at national and regional levels. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister announced in the Government's White Paper on modernising local government that local people should decide, in a referendum, whether they supported the creation of a directly elected mayor.

The White Paper also signalled the Government's support for the use of referendums as an important tool to give local people more say in such issues as major local developments or matters of particular local controversy. Several hon. Members have referred to that important and welcome development.

Mr. Letwin: Does the Minister recall the words of the Prime Minister, who stated:

"I want to renew faith in politics through a government that will . . . play by the rules"?

Will he now give a categorical assurance that his Government will not hold any more referendums beyond those that he has already described without implementing rules to give effect to those words?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) asked specific questions to that effect and I shall answer those in due course, so if the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) exercises a little patience, I will come to that point.

It is clear from the agenda for modernising the political structures of our country that referendums will continue to play an important part in our political life. That was recognised by the Neill committee's report on the funding of political parties and the Electoral Reform Society's commission on the conduct of referendums, which reported in 1996 under the chairmanship of Sir Patrick Nairne. The right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) and the hon. Member for Blaby referred to the work done by Sir Patrick Nairne and those who sat on his commission.

Until now, the practice has been to organise referendums case by case. In seven out of the eight referendums that have so far been held, statutory authority for the poll was derived from dedicated primary legislation. In the eighth case—the 1998 Northern Ireland poll—the statutory authority was derived from an order made under the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996.

It is clear from a quick reading of the various referendum Acts that there is now a reasonably well-established set of statutory provisions that are needed to provide for a referendum to be held. Typically, legislation for holding referendums has defined persons eligible to vote. The hon. Member for Billericay implied that anybody who has Scottish ancestry should have had a vote in the Scottish referendum, even if they did not live in Scotland. We do not agree, but it is important, as she suggested, to define who is eligible and who is not. The legislation usually needs also to specify the question.

Mrs. Gorman: My point was that the entire population should be considered suitable to express a view on an issue that concerns the whole nation. I was referring not only to people of Scottish ancestry, but the population of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howarth: I am sorry—I had misunderstood the hon. Lady.

The legislation must also determine the date of the referendum, provide for the appointment of a chief counting officer with responsibility for counting the votes and announcing the result and provide powers to adapt existing electoral machinery as necessary.

In addition, the Referendum Act 1975 provided for grants to be made towards the cost of campaigning. That subject has been well ventilated during the debate, it is dealt with in the Bill, and I shall return to it later. The Neill committee's recommendations consider other issues, such as the registration of campaign organisations, to which I shall also return in due course.

If, as appears to be the case, referendums are to become a permanent feature of our political life, there is certainly an argument for setting up standing machinery for their conduct. We have such machinery for elections, so why not for referendums? There is a good deal of force in that argument, but, on the other hand, the process of selecting items for inclusion in a generic referendums Bill is, as the debate has demonstrated, by no means straightforward.

Mr. Cash: The Minister may recall the rather controversial Referendum Bill that I introduced in 1996, which caused something of a furore, and my Maastricht referendum campaign, which attracted 350,000 signatures, in 1993. That campaign was chaired by me, a Liberal Democrat and a Labour Member. At the heart of our debate is not simply the question of the generics of the Bill, but the extent to which the people may be misled if broadcasting is not accurate and impartial. Will the Minister be good enough to tell me whether the Government's Bill, like this Bill, will include specific and legally accurate provisions to ensure due impartiality on the part of Eurorealists and Europhiles? This is not a party political issue.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman mentions fairness in broadcasting. If he will bear with me, I shall cover that point later.

I have already outlined the type of provisions that have typically featured in dedicated referendum Acts. We need to pause before throwing all the individual ingredients into a generic referendums Bill. One approach might be to create a broad order-making power enabling a referendum to be called on any issue. The effect of that, however, would be to restrict Parliament's ability to debate the merits of holding a referendum on any particular issue, the wording of the question and the timing of the poll. There is a strong argument for saying that, on matters of national constitutional significance, there should be a full opportunity for Parliament to give its consent to each and every referendum, and that Parliament should set the question.

If we put to one side the question and the timing of any given referendum, we are left with the nuts and bolts of referendums. As the Neill committee recognised, however, these are still matters of great importance. Like justice, referendums must be conducted, and be seen to be conducted, fairly—I think that the hon. Member for Blaby made the same point in slightly different words. A generic referendums Bill could establish clear ground rules to ensure that that is so.

The Bill properly focuses on two ground rules—core public funding and equal access to the broadcast media—but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will concede that there are others. If we are to have ground rules, as I believe that we must, perhaps the first question to ask is, who or what sort of body is to police them? The Bill provides for the establishment of a referendums commission, as recommended by, I think, the Nairne commission—I believe that the hon. Gentleman conceded that his proposal was taken from that model—and as supported by the Jenkins commission on the voting system. The hon. Gentleman has sensibly been open in recognising that his referendums commission is intended only as an interim arrangement until a more suitable body is established under subsequent legislation.

During the debate on the Neill committee's report on 9 November last year, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced that the Government had accepted the case for the establishment of an electoral commission. As my right hon. Friend said in that debate, we are considering the precise role and remit of the electoral commission.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) said, it is clear that we do not want a plethora of bodies responsible for different aspects of elections, as well as referendums. If Parliament determines that a body of this kind should have functions in relation to referendums, it would make every sense to confer those functions on the electoral commission. Precisely what that entails remains at this stage a matter for more detailed consideration, but there must be some doubt about the wisdom of setting up a separate referendums commission at a time when the Government have accepted the need for an electoral commission, and there are no new referendums on the immediate horizon. I shall return to that point. It is perfectly possible that a body established in this way would never have any role before being superseded by the electoral commission.

The Government will want to use the next few months—

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) rose—

Mr. Howarth: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I must then make progress.

Mr. Green: Will the Minister confirm that he is telling the House that there will be no referendums between now and the next general election, including one on the electoral system?

Mr. Howarth: I have told the hon. Member for West Dorset that I intend to answer that question shortly so, if the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) will bear with me, I shall return to it.

During the next few months, we want to consider carefully how the electoral commission should be structured. I chair a working party on electorate procedures, on which the Conservative party and Liberal Democrat party are represented. Yesterday, we had a detailed and useful discussion on what the functions of an electoral commission should be, and what enabled us to discover variations in our thinking. We are not just treading water: something is happening. Discussions are taking place, and this debate is part of that discussion. The proceedings of that working party, on which both the opposition parties are represented, are also part of the consideration.

As the Neill committee said, the commission should be independent of Government and, as far as possible, the arrangements for making appointments to the commission and for setting its budget should reflect its independent status. On the appointments side, the hon. Member for Blaby has built in a role for the Speaker. That is one approach, and I would not rule out a role for the Speaker in connection with the electoral commission, but I would not in any way take the role or consent of the Speaker for granted at this stage of our debate.

The Bill is less forthcoming on the arrangements for setting the referendums commission's budget. There is the usual provision for money to be provided by Parliament to meet the commission's expenses, but the implication is that the commission's budget should be part of a departmental vote. The Neill committee pointed out that the mechanism for setting the budget of the National Audit Office provides a useful precedent, and it is one that we want to examine further.

I am sure that the House will agree that it is important to get the structure of the supervisory body right and to consider carefully the functions that it will need. The Nairne commission helpfully identified several possible functions—advising on the wording of the question; allocating funding to campaign groups; liaising with, and acting as a moderator between, any campaign groups; acting in an ombudsman role to deal with any complaints; monitoring balanced access to broadcast media; providing public information, including a balanced statement of the opposing arguments; and supervising the organisation of polling stations and counting and declaration arrangements. The commission also suggested that a continuing role might be to identify lessons from each referendum and to recommend any necessary changes in procedure for future referendums.

That is an impressive list, which requires detailed analysis. The promoter and sponsors of the Bill have obviously concluded that their referendums commission should have a more limited remit. On my reading of the Bill, the proposed commission's functions would be limited to advising and reporting on referendums in general; advising on the wording of the question; designating a referendum campaign body for each possible outcome; making grants to such designated campaign bodies; and reporting on the conduct of each referendum.

There may be a closer affinity between the functions that I have just listed and the functions recommended by the Neill committee, but even the list that I just enumerated is no small undertaking. We need to be sure that the functions conferred on any oversight body are appropriate. For example, should a referendums commission have a role in relation to all national, regional and local referendums? My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) drew attention to some of the difficulties that might arise in that regard.

Clause 4 requires the referendums commission to "make a report to the Secretary of State on the conduct of any referendum conducted under any enactment".

As I read the Bill, that could include local referendums.

I have mentioned the Deputy Prime Minister's plans for local consultative referendums on such issues as major local developments and matters of local controversy. Those consultative referendums would be in addition to the binding referendums on whether there should be a directly elected mayor. The proposals in the Bill create potential for hundreds of local referendums to be conducted throughout the country every year. If the referendums commission was expected to report on every local referendum, it would need very many staff.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Blaby would agree that a balance must be achieved. We do not yet have a ready answer to that problem, but my instinct is that the Bill has not quite achieved a balance, although I accept that that is not as a result of prejudice on the hon. Gentleman's part, but simply reflects the complexity of the issues involved.

Clause 2 would provide for the designation, by the referendums commission, of referendum campaign organisations. The clause seeks to implement recommendation 85 of the Neill report, which provided that "the Election Commission should decide which organisations, if any, should be in receipt of core funding".

There is, however, a key difference between what the clause provides for and the substance of the recommendation. The Neill committee acknowledged that identifying one organisation on either side of a referendum campaign which stood out from all other such organisations may not always be straightforward.

In 1975, the position was clear. The Government issued a White Paper, which advised:

"The Government are prepared to consider providing limited financial assistance, to be equally divided between the two sides, if it is possible to identify two organisations which adequately represent those campaigning for and against continued membership of the Community."

Events moved rapidly, to such an extent that, when the Referendum Bill was published on 26 March 1975, it provided for grants to be made to two named organisations: Britain in Europe and the National Referendum Campaign. It must be remembered that, at that time, the political landscape was in many ways not as complicated or crowded as it is today.

Other more recent referendum campaigns have spawned their own umbrella cross-party groups. Although such umbrella groups have emerged more often than not, the Neill committee pointed to the no campaign in Scotland in 1997 and the yes campaign in Northern Ireland in 1998, where such groups were not an obvious feature of the campaign.

Clause 2(2) requires the referendums commission to certify one organisation on each side

"as the designated referendum campaign".

As my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley pointed out, such a provision could place the commission in a very difficult, if not impossible, position. As the Neill committee sensibly recommended, it would be unwise to box the commission into such a corner.

[Mr. Howarth]

Another potential difficulty for the electoral commission is that the Bill refers to

"each of the possible outcomes"

in a referendum. In most cases, as the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) suggested, the possible outcomes are clear because electors are asked to vote either yes or no to a single question, or for one of two opposing propositions. The 1997 Scottish devolution referendum does not, however, fit neatly into this framework.

The House will recall that, in 1997, the Scottish people were presented with a two-part ballot paper. Voters were asked, first, to indicate whether they agreed or disagreed that there should be a Scottish Parliament, and secondly, whether they agreed or disagreed that a Scottish Parliament should have tax-varying powers. In theory, therefore, there were four possible outcomes: yes to a Scottish Parliament and yes to giving it tax-varying powers; no to both; yes to a Scottish Parliament, but no to giving it tax-varying powers; and no to a Scottish Parliament, but yes to giving it tax-varying powers.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman please answer this question: is he suggesting that, under the Bill, there could be two questions in a referendum—one asking people whether they wanted a single currency, and the other asking people whether they wanted to be part of the European Union? If that is what the Government have in mind, they are following a very dangerous path.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that that was not what I meant. I was merely referring to the fact that, in different campaigns and referendums, there could be more complicated sets of questions.

In practice, in the Scottish devolution referendum, campaigners fought for either a yes or a no vote to both propositions. None the less, given four possible outcomes, the referendums commission would be obliged under the Bill to designate four referendum campaign organisations, and pay each of them a grant in order that a campaign may be conducted. That example, and others that we have heard, demonstrate the difficulty of setting up a framework that covers all possible future circumstances. Despite the difficulties, we should not be put off trying to find a workable solution. All credit is due to the hon. Member for Blaby for introducing the Bill so that we can begin to discuss the issues.

Once we get over the problem of identifying the lead campaign body on each side of the referendum, there is the question of core funding, which several hon. Members raised. Clause 3(1) provides for grants to be made to the designated referendum campaigns and stipulates, in paragraph (b), that the same amount must be given to each side. It is worth spending a little time examining that proposition.

Recommendation 84 of the Neill report did indeed propose that "each side should be given equal access to an amount of core funding".

From the preceding paragraphs in the report, it is clear that the concern was that each side should have sufficient funds to enable it to mount a minimum campaign. By "sufficient funds", the Neill Committee meant sufficient "to cover minimal office accommodation, the purchase or rental of a quantity of office equipment and supplies, and the salaries of three or four members of staff for the duration of the campaign".

In making that recommendation, as the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) accepted, the Neill Committee pointed to the precedent of the 1975 referendum. Section 3 of the Referendum Act 1975 provided for a grant not exceeding £125,000 to be made to the two main campaign organisations.

The official accounts of Britain in Europe and the National Referendum Campaign were published in October 1975 (Cmnd. 6215). As an historical insight into the politics of the 1970s, that document makes interesting reading. As well as the audited receipts and payments accounts, the document lists all the individual donations of £100 or more received by the two campaigns.

The list for Britain in Europe—the yes campaign—includes the names of 369 individuals and organisations who together donated nearly £1 million. The list reads like a "Who's Who" of British industry and commerce, including as it does such companies as ICI, Marks and Spencer, Shell UK and the Rank Organisation. The list of donors to the National Referendum Campaign—the no campaign—makes rather more poignant reading. There were just seven individuals or organisations identified as having given more than £100.

The key fact that the accounts reveal is that the Government grant to the Britain in Europe campaign represented only 8 per cent. of its total income, whereas the grant to the National Referendum Campaign represented a massive 94 per cent. of its total income. In a typically thoughtful speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) alluded to that problem, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas).

If the purpose of core funding is to ensure that each side has sufficient funds to run at least a minimal campaign, it is arguable whether it was strictly necessary in 1975 to award funding to the Britain in Europe campaign at all. I am not making the case one way or the other, but simply posing the question whether the requirement to be fair to each side overrides all other considerations.

Dr. Fox: The Minister has been speaking for 29 minutes. He has three times said that he would answer a straight question. Will or will not the Government give a commitment that they will not introduce proposals for a referendum in this country until fair rules are established, under this Bill or subsequent legislation?

Mr. Howarth: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I intend to cover that in my speech. If he will exercise a little patience, I shall deal with the matter—there is plenty of time.

The question is whether, in the circumstances that I described, it was necessary to give a commitment to funding for both sides. Where core funding is available, it seems sensible not to spread it too thinly across a number of campaigning groups. The Neill committee's approach, which the Bill adopts, was to allocate the funding to only one organisation on each side of the referendum. However, we should not lose sight of the fact that there may be many other organisations, in addition to the lead umbrella groups, that are campaigning in the referendum.

Bill read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 63(1) (Committal of Bills).

Cheques (Scotland) Bill

2.22 pm

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I have pleasure in introducing this Bill to the House for its Second Reading. It tackles an historical anomaly created by the Bills of Exchange Act 1882, through the applications of the funds-attached principle, which affects the customers of Scottish banks.

I thank the Committee of Scottish Clearing Bankers for its assistance in the preparation of the Bill and for raising this important issue in the banking sector. I also thank the Economic Secretary and her officials, who have assisted in the preparation of the Bill.

The funds-attached principle means that a cheque operates as an assignation of the sum for which it is drawn in favour of the owner of the cheque. If there are insufficient funds to meet a cheque when it is presented, whatever sums are available are attached and suspended, to be passed over eventually to the owner of the cheque, should he or she fail to get full value for it by other means. That is a cumbersome administrative procedure. The banks estimate that it involves the operation of 100,000 accounts in any year and that the measure would save the Scottish clearing banks approximately £250,000 a year in administrative costs.

The operation of that principle was considered by the Review Committee on Banking Services Law, chaired by Professor Jack under the previous Government, who accepted the recommendations of the Jack committee subject to consultation. That consultation indicated that there was support for the measure.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Swinney: No, I am short of time.

The Jack committee's recommendations were that the principle be abolished so that administrative savings and administrative convenience could be assisted within the banking sector. The Bill has the support of the four Scottish clearing banks and I hope that it will command the support of the House.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): The hon. Gentleman scarcely did justice to the Bill, which has implications that go beyond the rather narrow definition that he gave, although I understand why, at a time such as this, he did that. I wanted to ask him several questions, but he was not prepared to answer them, so I will have to go into them in a little detail. That is the way these things happen.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): It will be taken unkindly in Scotland if the right hon. Gentleman obstructs the passage of the Bill by speaking at great length when it enjoys such widespread support.

Mr. Forth: At 2.25 pm, I leave the right hon. Gentleman to consider what great length might be.

Perhaps we could discuss it another time. If he is suggesting that the people of Scotland expect legislation to go through without proper scrutiny, it reflects badly on them if not on him. I hope that he is not.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): The hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) spoke for more than an hour on the Referendums Bill—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We are not going to discuss what happened in a previous debate. We must keep to the terms of the Bill.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful for that guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

One of the issues properly raised by the Bill is whether this is a matter for the House of Commons and the Westminster procedure.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the previous Government, following the recommendations of the Jack committee, and the subsequent favourable consultation, were minded to introduce the measure but unfortunately did not have the time? Will he therefore support the Bill?

Mr. Forth: It appears that this Government cannot find the time either. It appears that the measure is so important that neither Government could find time for it.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): To put the record straight, the Opposition support this eminently sensible Bill. The funds attached rule is absurd. I hope that the Bill progresses this afternoon.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I assume that, in the best traditions of the House, he will wish to explain at greater length why he and his colleagues favour the Bill. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, agree that it is an essential part of the legislative process, that any measure however small or narrow, must be properly considered in the House of Commons. All views must be heard, both those of Front Benchers and those of Back Benchers. I welcome the opportunity that my hon. Friend will no doubt seek to set out his position in some detail. He might then answer the question to which the Minister's comments give rise—namely, why the previous Government failed to find time for the measure when they are alleged to have supported it. The same seems to apply to this Government. However excellent they may say they find the measure, they have not yet found time for it in their programme. We are therefore here today, following the private Members' procedure, rightly considering the principle of the Bill on Second Reading.

Mr. Maclean: Does not my right hon. Friend find outrageous the suggestion that, as we have had a two-minute speech by the Bill's promoter and declarations in favour, although no speeches, from the Front-Bench spokesmen, the Bill must be bounced through without discussion?

Mr. Forth: I agree with my right hon. Friend. It would be very much in tune with the contempt in which the Government normally hold the House for them to expect a measure such as this to be shoved through without proper debate.

Ms Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise the irony of two Scottish Conservative Members opposing a measure that will benefit Scots and Scotland? Admittedly, like me, they represent English seats.

Mr. Forth: That brings me to the first question of substance. I am grateful to the hon. Lady for leading me in the direction that I wanted to follow. She has rightly pointed out that there is an irony in the fact that it is this House, with Members such as me considering this measure at this stage—the hon. Lady might, if she were to catch—

Tibet

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

2.32 pm

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): I am grateful for the opportunity to make progress with my Adjournment debate, and that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) will not be able to prevent me from doing so in the next half hour.

Wednesday 10 March was the 40th anniversary of the uprising in Lhasa, when the Chinese finally made clear their intention to rule Tibet with a rod of iron. I am grateful that today we have not just the Minister with us but, in the Public Gallery, representatives from the Tibetan community in this country, including Migyer Dorjee, a representative of his Holiness—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Perhaps I might teach the hon. Gentleman something. He may not refer to anyone outside the Chamber, and that includes the Public Gallery.

Mr. Baker: I was unaware of that ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I shall respect it.

Since 1959, thousands of innocent Tibetans have been killed, imprisoned and tortured for no other reason than that they are Tibetan. The Chinese flag was raised for the first time in Lhasa on 23 March 1959—almost 40 years ago to the day. Within three days of the uprising, 10,000 Tibetans had been killed. Treasures from Tibet, especially from the monasteries, were looted and removed to China—in the same way as the Nazi Government in Germany behaved towards countries that they had invaded. By 1961, the land under cultivation had increased by 22.5 per cent. as a consequence of Chinese involvement, but Tibet suffered famine of epidemic proportions because grain was shipped out of Tibet to China. Tibetans starved in their thousands: so bad was the situation that parents were forced to feed their dying children with their own blood in an effort to keep them alive.

If that were not bad enough, the situation worsened with the onset of the cultural revolution, which affected Tibet as well as China. I could list statistic after statistic from that period, but suffice it to say that, before the Chinese decided to interfere in Tibet, there were more than 6,000 monasteries whereas, by the end of the cultural revolution, only five years later, there were only 13—a catalogue of destruction unimaginable in this country. Hundreds of works of art were destroyed—it seemed that everything Tibetan was up for destruction. The Tibetans are a religious people, but their religious places were used for keeping pigs in a deliberate attempt to denigrate Tibet's religion—contrary to the theoretical meaning of the Chinese constitution. In 1968, movement beyond house and field was forbidden, and Chinese officials' permission was required to collect firewood. By 1973, in just 14 years, one seventh of the Tibetan population had been killed as a consequence of the Chinese invasion.

Over the past 40 years, a policy of what can be described only as apartheid has been operated in Tibet. Electricity has been provided for the capital, but only in the Chinese quarters. Free medical care has been supplied for settlers, but only barefoot doctors are available for Tibetans. Food rations have been available for the whole population, but, when rationing is in place, the Chinese have received twice as much as Tibetans. All business has to be conducted in Chinese. Few Tibetans are in positions of power in Tibet, and those who are could be described as accomplices of the Chinese regime.

With my interest in the environment, I find the environmental damage that Tibet has suffered in the past 40 years horrifying. The Tibetans, as Buddhists, respect life in all its forms, but hitherto protected wildlife has been slaughtered to such an extent that formerly abundant species are now threatened with extinction. The snow leopard, the Himalayan monkey, wild yaks and gazelles are all on the brink of extinction as a consequence of Chinese involvement in Tibet. In addition, Tibet has been used as a convenient location for the dumping of nuclear waste. Deforestation continues apace, as the once prevalent Tibetan forests are cut down and the wood exported to China. That has not only destroyed the forests but has led to numerous environmental problems within Tibet. A once proud country has been raped and pillaged.

From 1977 to 1980, there was a slight improvement, and Hu Yaobang visited the country and admitted that mistakes had been made. However, it has all been downhill since then. In their own country, Tibetans continue to be second-class citizens, subject to arbitrary arrest and to torture with weapons such as electric batons. Ordinary Tibetans, whether or not they are monks or nuns, are subject to gross human rights abuses that no one in this world could possible defend. Such is the repression that it is now an offence to own or display a Tibetan flag. I have here a Tibetan flag and, by showing it to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am committing a simple act which, if I were in Lhasa, would make me subject to arbitrary arrest, imprisonment and torture.

For monks and nuns to have pictures of the Dalai Lama in their monasteries is now an offence. The Dalai Lama is the religious leader of Tibet; how can the Chinese possible claim to respect human rights and religious freedom when they go to such lengths to prevent Tibetans from possessing even photographs? On numerous occasions since 1959, monks and nuns have been required to issue ritual denunciations of the Dalai Lama and to undertake all sorts of horrific acts to demonstrate those denunciations of their religious leader.

The Tibetans, who are a proud and brave people, continue their protests. The Chinese will never win the hearts and minds of Tibetans as long as they continue their current policies of repression. They cannot win in that way, so, instead, they are trying to win in a far more insidious way. China is operating a policy of mass migration of Han Chinese into Tibet, with the clear intention of making Tibetans a minority within their own country. That is nothing new for China: it did the same thing in places such as Mongolia.

By 1982, a third of Lhasa was occupied by Chinese. Today, Lhasa is a Chinese city. Much of the original city has been destroyed and replaced with grey, faceless 1950s buildings. The policy of deliberately making Tibetans a minority in their own country, treating them as second-class citizens and destroying their civilisation I can only describe—and it is not a word I use cavalierly—as genocide.

I turn briefly to the international perspective. I believe that Tibet is legally an independent country—that is not the position of the British Government, and the Minister will elaborate on that point—and that China is an occupying power. I could cite at length the history of Tibet's independence and I have gathered information from previous centuries to back my case. I do not have time to set it out in full detail.

In 1876, the Chefoo convention gave the United Kingdom the right to establish a trade mission in Tibet. The United Kingdom had signed a similar convention in 1858 relating to China. Therefore, by reaching a separate agreement with Tibet, the United Kingdom recognised that that country was not part of China. In 1894, the then Foreign Secretary, the Marquis of Salisbury, said:

"If the Chinese ever had any authority in Tibet, they certainly have none now."

At the very least, the British Government recognised Tibet's de facto independence from China.

In 1904, the United Kingdom and Tibet signed the Lhasa convention. China objected, but the United Kingdom replied:

"Tibet is not one of the 18 provinces of the Chinese Empire."

Treaties have been signed by the United Kingdom and Tibet. China had no tax-raising powers in Tibet and had to pay taxes on its goods entering Tibet. How else do we define independence and sovereignty? Tibet conducted its own foreign policy. Those are the hallmarks of an independent country.

China invaded Tibet in 1905. However, after the Chinese emperor was deposed in 1910, the Dalai Lama declared all ties broken and the last Chinese troops left Tibet in 1913. Between 1913 and 1959, there is no question but that Tibet operated as an independent country, with its own currency and stamps. When China declared that Tibet was part of China, British authorities in this country issued a formal protest about that declaration.

Britain plays an important role in relation to Tibet. When the 1959 uprising occurred, Britain was the only independent witness to that event. We have enjoyed long relations with Tibet and, in this century and the last, Britain has been closer than any other country to Tibet. Therefore, we have an historical duty to represent the views of the Tibetan people.

There are further indications that Britain recognised Tibet's independence. In 1914, the British signed an agreement with Tibet—the Simla convention. The British said:

"the Chinese Government will of course lose all the privileges and advantages which the tripartite convention"— the alternative agreement—

"secures to them, including recognition of Chinese suzerainty over Tibet; while the return of the Chinese Resident at Lhasa"—

the Amban—

"will be postponed indefinitely and His Majesty's Government will render the Tibetans all possible assistance in resisting Chinese aggression."

In 1921, Curzon, the then Foreign Minister, told the Chinese:

"We shall regard ourselves at liberty to deal with Tibet, if necessary, without again referring to China; to enter into closer relations with the Tibetans; to send an officer to Lhasa from time to time to consult the Tibetan Government . . . and to give Tibetans any reasonable assistance they might require in the development and protection of their country."

It is clear that the British, in the inter-war years, recognised Tibet as an independent country.

When Tibet asserted her neutrality in the second world war, the British Foreign Office said:

"The Tibetans have every moral right to their independence for which they have fought successfully in the past, and we are committed to support them in maintaining it".

That is what the British Government said in 1942. They continued:

"For over 30 years (Tibetans) have enjoyed de facto independence and do not wish to be subjugated".

I believe it is quite clear that Tibet is an independent country and that China is an occupying force. Because of our historical connections with Tibet, Britain can play an important role in clarifying that position and pushing for human rights improvements and the recognition of Tibet. The Government must take up that role.

Unfortunately, for reasons of realpolitik, Tibet has been abandoned by the west since 1959. Tibet is not geographically important. It has no natural resources that the British, American and other western Governments need. It does not have the strategic importance of Kuwait. China is powerful, and there are other interests to consider, such as Hong Kong and trade relations.

The Government will never condone the human rights abuses in China. I acknowledge that they regularly make protests about those to the Chinese. They have genuinely tried to engage the Chinese in constructive dialogue and persuade them to change direction. As I said in an oral question to the Minister on Tuesday, I do not criticise that process in any way, but, unfortunately, the Chinese regard it as weakness. They have signed plenty of bits of paper in the past year to say that they will improve their human rights, but human rights have got worse in Tibet and China in that time. There has been no end to the invasion of Tibet by migrating Han Chinese. There has been no meeting with the Dalai Lama. In short, there has been no progress.

I should like the Minister to answer four questions in his reply. First, will the Government recognise that Tibet was independent before 1959 and that China is therefore an occupying power? Will the Minister admit that Tibet is not part of China? That is an important question.

Secondly, will the Government support a motion at the meeting of the UN Commission on Human Rights, due to take place on 22 March, condemning China, specifically mentioning Tibet, and pressing China to negotiate with the Dalai Lama?

Thirdly, will the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary meet the Dalai Lama when he visits the United Kingdom in May?

Finally, will the UK demand, with our European Union partners, the immediate release of the Panchen Lama, who has been imprisoned, without justification, in mainland China? Will the Government further demand that independent witnesses from the EU or the Government be sent to verify that the Panchen Lama is still alive and healthy?

Tibet is a wonderful country, which has been dealt a bad hand in the past 40 years. This country has an historical relationship with Tibet that gives us a moral duty to do what we can to help those people.

2.47 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on raising this issue and the way in which he put his arguments. I thank him for bringing to the House his concerns and those of others.

The hon. Gentleman has expressed his understandable worries about the situation in Tibet. He knows that Tibet is, rightly, of concern to the wider public and Members of the House. As he said, the issue has been brought sharply into focus this week with the 40th anniversary of the exile from Tibet of the Dalai Lama. The hon. Gentleman's timing is extremely good.

The Government share the deep concerns expressed by many hon. Members and we are actively addressing them with the Chinese through our human rights dialogues and other contacts. Tibet features prominently in those discussions and in the points that we make about human rights. The hon. Gentleman said that, for reasons of realpolitik, western Governments have abandoned Tibet. That is not the case; we have not abandoned the people of Tibet, and we shall continue to express our concerns and raise many of the issues to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

The hon. Gentleman asked me four questions, the first of which related to the status of Tibet. He knew the answer to the question even as he asked it, but it may be worth while putting on record again the position taken by successive UK Governments. They have regarded Tibet as autonomous, while recognising the special position of China there. That continues to be the policy of this Government. As the hon. Gentleman knows—he expressed his regrets on this point—Tibet has never been internationally recognised as independent. This Government and our predecessors have not recognised the Dalai Lama's government in exile. However, we believe strongly that the Tibetans should have a greater say in running their own affairs, and we have urged the Chinese authorities to respect the distinct cultural, religious and ethnic identities of the Tibetan people. The hon. Gentleman rightly made several powerful points about the way in which those distinct identities have been undermined in the past four decades.

We do not recognise the Dalai Lama as the head of the Tibetan Government-in-exile, but we do acknowledge him as a highly respected spiritual leader, the winner of the Nobel peace prize and an important and influential force. He has visited the United Kingdom several times, and we look forward to his visit in May when he will be met at an appropriate level by members of the Government.

The best way to achieve a lasting solution to the situation in Tibet is through dialogue between the Chinese Government and the Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama, without any preconditions. We continue to urge China to enter into such a dialogue. The hon. Gentleman may wish to know that, when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister visited China in October last year, he raised the question of Tibet and our concerns about human rights and put forward the points that I have just made about the need for a dialogue between the Chinese Government and the Tibetans, involving the Dalai Lama.

We have also expressed many deep concerns to the Chinese about the situation in Tibet. The hon. Gentleman referred to some of them. They include the "re-education" of monks and nuns in Tibet, under which some, as he said, are reported to be required to renounce their loyalty to the Dalai Lama. We have also expressed our concern about the reported restrictions on the display of the Dalai Lama's picture and the use of the Tibetan flag, which the hon. Gentleman also highlighted. We have raised all those issues in our dialogue with the Chinese.

China's recent atheist propaganda campaign has also given us cause for concern. We most certainly believe that the Chinese should see religion as fulfilling a basic human need and right. Religion should never be seen as a threat. Again, I give the hon. Gentleman a clear commitment that we shall continue to raise such matters.

We are also concerned about the future of the special ethnic, cultural and religious characteristics of Tibet in light of the conditions there. The hon. Gentleman mentioned reports of the migration of a significant number of Han Chinese to the Tibet Autonomous Region. Again, we wish the essential characteristics of Tibetan culture to be maintained, not subverted and undermined.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Panchen Lama. The detention in 1995 of Gedhun Choekyi Nyima raises particular concerns. The boy, who will be only 10 years old in April, was detained following his recognition in 1995 by the Dalai Lama as the Panchen Lama, the second highest religious figure in Tibet. The UK Government are not in a position to hold a view on the child's candidacy as the Panchen Lama—that is clearly a matter for the Tibetans alone to decide—but he is just a child, and we are concerned about his welfare. We have repeatedly asked the Chinese to be allowed to visit him to check on his well-being. Regrettably, this request has not been granted by China. We shall continue to raise his case and that of other Tibetans with the Chinese at each and every opportunity.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the positions adopted by this Government. It might be worth while to remind him, although I do not think that he has forgotten, of the special initiative that we took during our presidency of the EU. For the first time, a delegation of EU Troika ambassadors in Beijing made a week-long visit to Tibet in May last year to make an assessment of the situation there. We were pleased that that took place during the British presidency. The delegation was led by the British ambassador and was supported by a British Tibetan speaker, which was in itself an important innovation and precedent. As a result of that visit, the European Union as a whole agreed some common guidelines for addressing the issue of Tibet. It may be useful if I list them.

The first guideline was to urge China to respect human rights in Tibet. The second was to encourage China to begin talks with the Dalai Lama. The third was to target development assistance for ethnic Tibetans to help them to compete and survive in the economy. The fourth was to seek to preserve the Tibetan language and culture.

I hope that the hon. Member for Lewes will recognise that Europe and the United Kingdom are supporting the human rights dialogue with practical co-operation. While in Tibet, the EU Troika ambassadors visited Pa Nam, the site of a £5.1 million EU rural development project. That project will directly benefit indigenous Tibetan people by providing employment, training and access to land. Britain alone will contribute about 15 per cent. of the costs of that project. The Government are also providing development assistance to Tibet through the Save the Children projects in education and health, so we are pleased that the Troika ambassadors' visit took place. It was a welcome visit, and it was a welcome initiative on our part.

The hon. Gentleman asked about our overall approach to the issue of human rights and the forthcoming meetings in Geneva. Perhaps I may take a few minutes to put those in context. Since the successful handover of sovereignty in Hong Kong in July 1997, the Government have succeeded in placing our relations with China on a new, more constructive basis. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's visit to China last year strengthened that relationship. We shall continue to build on it and we look forward to welcoming President Jiang Zemin to the United Kingdom in the autumn.

As part of that relationship, we are addressing our human rights concerns in a variety of ways. We have raised them directly with the Chinese Government. The Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister did so when they met Chinese leaders during their visits to China last year. I will do so when I visit China next month. We do so regularly with the Chinese ambassador in London. We shall continue to press the Chinese Government to live up to the standards of the international covenants that they have signed—a process that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

The two processes—dialogue and the raising of specific cases—are often regarded as mutually exclusive. They are not. We have been able to express our concerns about individual cases—about what we would see as the violation of human rights—and to place those in the overall dialogue. We feel that that may well be the most constructive way to proceed. However, I emphasise that dialogue is not an end in itself. It must be a means to achieve an improvement in human rights in China—otherwise, the dialogue has no purpose. It is a vehicle for achieving change.

As a result of the dialogue, there have been some improvements in China, but there have been some very disappointing recent developments there about which we have expressed, and shall continue to express, our deep concerns.

Twelve positive steps have emerged from the dialogue, and it is worth remembering them and considering how much progress we could have made without the dialogue. In October 1997, China signed the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights. In October 1998, China signed the international covenant on civil and political rights. In September 1998, there was the visit to China and to Tibet by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mary Robinson. There was the visit to China and to Tibet by the UN working group on arbitrary detention. An invitation was extended to the UN special rapporteur on torture, who also visited China.

Chinese agreement was given to report separately on Hong Kong under the two international covenants. The EU Troika ambassadors visited Tibet. Discussions took place with the Chinese on issues of serious human rights concerns, including individual cases, the death penalty, conditions of detention and Tibet. There was collaboration on the EU-China human rights co-operation programme, which includes projects in the areas of civil and political rights as well as economic and social rights, and those activities have been funded by the European Commission. There have been two EU-China legal affairs seminars, and a seminar on the rights of women. The Chinese accepted participation in the dialogue of critical western non-governmental organisations, such as Amnesty International. Finally, Chinese prosecutors have shown suspects a card describing human and basic rights in court proceedings.

Those are signs of the progress that we have made. We must decide in Geneva—we want European Union member states to take the decision together—whether we can achieve more by other means. It is a tactical not a principled question. I think that the hon. Gentleman and I share very much the same agenda.

Mr. Baker: I am grateful to the Minister for approaching this productively. When China signed the international covenant on civil and political rights in October 1998, China Daily said:

> "It is not that China's stance or policies on the issue of human rights have changed . . . rather that the belated favourable turn in the international atmosphere has created an opportunity for China to elaborate its perspectives".

I am very concerned that China is signing bits of paper but changing nothing.

Mr. Fatchett: I understand that concern; we seek change. As I said, we are wedded not to the process but to the outcomes. That is why the question becomes tactical. China's signing into the international human rights regime is important in itself. It is a statement in itself, on which we must build. From the process to which I have referred, we never expected overnight, dramatic changes. The process is a long one, and we are committed to it.

I hope that I have been able to persuade the hon. Gentleman and those who have a real interest in the future of Tibet and its people that this Government share many of their concerns. We are active on those concerns, and will continue to raise them on behalf not just of individual Lobby groups or Members of Parliament but of the United Kingdom Government. That forms a central part of our dialogue on human rights and, because of it, to return to a phrase used by the hon. Gentleman, we will not forget Tibet. Tibet forms an essential and central part of what we are trying to do on human rights.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes past Three o'clock.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many ambassadors and high commissioners there are; how many of them (a) are women, (b) are members of ethnic minorities, (c) have Oxbridge degrees and (d) were educated at public schools; and if he will make a statement. [74880]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: As of 1 March 1999 there were 148 Ambassadors and High Commissioners and High Commissioners/Ambassadors designate. Seven are women. None are members of ethnic minorities. Eighty-four have degrees from Oxford or Cambridge universities. Information on the schools they attended is incomplete but at least sixty were educated at private schools and at least fifty-eight were educated at state schools.

Western Sahara

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the UN to be able to conduct a referendum on the future of the Western Sahara. [74872]

Mr. Fatchett: In his report of 11 December 1998 the UN Secretary-General stated that it is the United Nations' intention to hold the referendum in the Western Sahara in December 1999, provided that it receives full co-operation from the parties involved. We fully support the UN in its efforts to achieve this goal and hope that this deadline will be met.

Sierra Leone

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the EU member states that are assessing the need to provide extra funds to Sierra Leone; when he requested them to do so; and what form the invitation took. [75482]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The new £10 million package of British assistance to Sierra Leone was announced by the Foreign Secretary on 2 March 1999, Official Report, columns 895–96. On the same day, we instructed our Embassies and High Commissions to invite not just our partners in the European Union, but around the world, to play their part. Support from other donors could include direct support for ECOMOG, for the Government of Sierra Leone, or for humanitarian or other assistance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he took the decision to commit up to an additional £10 million from the reserve for Sierra Leone; and over what period of time the sum will be spent. [75481]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The request from the Foreign Secretary for a contribution from the reserve for Sierra Leone was approved by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 18 February. We are inviting others in the international community to follow our lead in providing support to Sierra Leone; the £10 million will be spent as we receive matching new pledges from them.

Rambouillet Talks

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 605, for what reasons President Milosevic was not invited to join the Rambouillet talks. [75485]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The invitation allowed both sides to nominate their representatives at Rambouillet. It is a matter for the Federal Yugoslav and Serbian Governments as to why President Milosevic was not a member of their delegation.

Africa

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the representatives of the Governments of (a) Angola, (b) Zimbabwe, (c) Namibia, (d) Uganda, (e) the Democratic Republic of Congo and (f) South Africa whom the Minister of State met on his recent visits to the region, indicating the dates of the meetings. [75479]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: As the Prime Minister's Special Envoy I visited the Democratic Republic of the Congo and other African countries directly or indirectly involved in the conflict from 22–26 February to assess progress in African mediation efforts and to explore what more Britain and the international community may be able to do to support these. I met (a) Deputy Foreign Minister Miranda (24 February), (b) President Mugabe (25 February), (c) Prime Minister Geingob (24 February), (d) President Museveni (26 February), (e) President Kabila (23 February) and (f) Deputy Foreign Minister Pahad (22 February). I also met President Bizimungu and Vice President Kagame of Rwanda (25 February) and the Secretary General of the OAU (26 February).

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those (a) British citizens and (b) British citizens with dual nationality who have been kidnapped in Africa from 1 January 1998 to date, together with (i) the date of the kidnap, (ii) the identity, or suspected identity, of the kidnappers and (iii) the outcome of the kidnaps. [75484]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Not all kidnappings of British nationals are reported. However, to our knowledge, the following kidnappings have taken place in Africa since 1 January 1998:

On 10 March 1998, Lenard Holland and Barry Glover (both British nationals) were abducted by villagers in Warri, Nigeria, along with a US national. They were released unharmed on 12 March.

On 14 April 1998, Gordon Hutchinson, Andrew Odell, Mark Edward and Grevill Moteran (British nationals) were held hostage by fellow oil workers in Nigeria. They were released after four days.

On 11 August 1998, Douglas Kear (joint New Zealand/British national) was abducted, probably by Rwandan Interahamwe rebels, in the eastern Democractic Republic of Congo, along with two Swedes and a Canadian. The Canadian was released on 18 August. The fate of the other three remains unknown.

On 6 October 1998, Pierre de School-Meester (British national) was abducted by pirates from a ship off the Delta State Coast, Nigeria. He was released unharmed on 12 October 1998.

On 8 November 1998, following a UNITA attack on a diamond mine in north-east Angola in which two British nationals were killed, Jason Pope (British national) was abducted along with a South African, two Filipinos and several Angolans. Their fate remains unknown.

On 10 November 1998, Peter John Holgate (British national) was taken hostage with seven other oil rig workers by Ijaw youths in Bayelsa State, Nigeria. All eight were released unharmed on 17 November 1998.

On 9 February 1999, Jim Simpson (British national) was abducted by local youths in Warri, Nigeria, along with an Italian and a Nigerian. He was released unharmed on 17 February.

On 15 February 1999, Martin Westbury and his young son Benjamin (both British nationals) were abducted by armed youths in Warri, Nigeria. They were released unharmed on the same day.

On 1 March 1999, Joanne Cotton, Steve Roberts, Mark Lindgren, Martin Friend, Gary Tappenden (all British nationals and Mark Avis (joint New Zealand/British national) were abducted by Rwandan Interahamwe rebels in Bwindi National Park, western Uganda, along with a number of other Western tourists. Gary Tappenden and Mark Avis found their way to safety; the other four were murdered by their abductors, along with four US and New Zealand tourists.

On 3 March 1999, Ian Lane (British national) was abducted by armed men in Warri, Nigeria. The case has not yet been resolved.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations were made to the Minister of State during his recent visit to Africa concerning the targeting by the Interahamwe of (a) British and (b) American citizens. [75480]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: None.

Uganda

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department received from the Government of Uganda concerning travel advice between 1 January 1998 and 1 March 1999. [75487]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: None.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to assist the Ugandan authorities in their investigation into the murders and kidnappings at Bwindi National Park. [75483]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Ugandan President has promised us a full report on this tragic incident. A British police team arrived in Uganda on 5 March to assist the Ugandan authorities with their investigation.

Nigeria

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the President-elect of Nigeria following his announcement of the intention to withdraw Nigeria's peace keeping troops from Sierra Leone. [75477]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will visit Nigeria on 8 and 9 March. In his discussions with President-elect Obasanjo, the Foreign Secretary will pay tribute to the efforts which Nigeria is making to help provide security in Sierra Leone; and will stress the support which Britain is giving to ECOMOG to help it consolidate the security situation.

Rotherham Euro Experiment

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 22 February 1999, Official Report, column 192, on the Rotherham Euro Experiment, what role (a) ministers and (b) officials in his Department played in locating sponsors for the Rotherham Euro Experiment. [74491]

Ms Quin: (a) None. (b) None.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Environment Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the issues for discussion before the Environment Council of 11 and 12 March, indicating the position he proposes to take on each issue. [72738]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 24 February 1999]: The following issues will be debated in Brussels on 11–12 March:

Community strategy on climate change: Council conclusions.

Amended proposal for a Council Directive establishing a framework for Community action in the field of water policy: Common position.

Proposal for a Council Directive on end-of-life vehicles: Common position.

Community strategy to reduce CO_2 emissions from private cars—Commission negotiations with car manufacturers which are not members of ACEA: Council conclusions.

Proposal for a Council regulation allowing voluntary participation by organisations in a community eco-management and audit system: Policy debate.

Proposal for a Council Directive amending Directive 88/609/EEC, on the limitation of emissions of certain pollutants into the air from large combustion plants: Policy debate.

Proposal for a Council Directive on the incineration of waste: Progress report.

It has not been the practice of successive Administrations to indicate the position Ministers propose to take in advance of Council.

North Circular Road

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what were the (a) budgeted cost and (b) total final cost for the three contracts to extend the North Circular Road (A406) at the junction of Fore Street, N18 (A1010) extending eastwards to the boundary of the London Borough of Enfield; on what date each contract was to be completed and when they were actually completed; and if he will make a statement. [74202]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highway Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. Andrew Love, dated 8 March 1999:

The Minister for Transport in London, has asked Lawrie Haynes, the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, to reply to your recent parliamentary Question about the improvements to the A406 between Fore Street and Hall Lane. I am replying in Lawrie's absence from the office.

The information you asked for is in the attached table except for the information on the final cost of each of the three contracts. I am afraid it is not possible to provide this until the final accounts have been settled. I have therefore provided figures of the spend to date.

The delays in completing what were highly complex improvements to the A406, particularly at Fore Street, are regretted, but as you know, they were largely due to the contractors encountering unforeseen ground conditions. There were also difficulties installing the specialist mechanical and electrical equipment necessary for safety in the tunnel.

However, the improved road between Fore Street and Hall Lane now means that traffic on the A406 is able to run much more freely. It no longer has to compete with local traffic at the Fore Street, Angel Road and Lea Valley junctions, thus reducing congestion and delays to all road users. This coupled with the extensive landscaping we have carried out means that local people who live and work in the area can now enjoy a much safer, healthier and more attractive environment.

	Completion date
Highway scheme	Planned completion	Actual completion	Original works budget £ million (1992)	Spend to date (million)
Contract A: Fore Street Underpass	31 December 1997	4 December 1998 (Tunnel—16 July 1998)	56.6	62.0
Contract B: Angel Road Viaduct	16 January 1996	28 November 1996	31.4	39.6
Contract C: Lea Valley Viaduct	14 November 1995	22 August 1996	32.7	39.4
Total			120.7	141.0

Notes:
1. All figures are exclusive of VAT
2. Figures include the cost of works, statutory undertakers, variations of price and contingencies. They exclude Traffic Control Systems Unit (TCSU), Preparation and Supervision (P & S) and Land costs.

Departmental Websites

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason the current running cost estimate of the Environmental Protection Agency website is projected to rise to £1,000,000 in the year 2000–01. [74007]

Mr. Meacher: I am advised by the Environment Protection Agency that the estimated cost of running its website is projected to increase from £25,000 in 1998–99 to £100,000 in 2000–01. This estimate is based on current growth rates, comparisons with the US Environmental Protection Agency and costs of other internet services. The figure of £1,000,000+ is a rough and untested estimate of the cost in 2000–01 were the Agency to develop its information systems and businesses processes to provide a range of electronic services including electronic handling of 25% of licence applications and access to public registers. It is being considered alongside competing priorities but has not yet been subject to critical business assessment and does not feature in the Agency's current financial plans.

European Commission on the Regions

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will deposit in the Library a copy of the report of the April 1998 Conference organised at Brighton by the European Commission on the Regions. [74443]

Mr. Caborn: I regret that the Department was unable to determine from the Question which conference the right hon. Member has in mind. If he would like to write with further details, I would be happy to consider his request further.

Supermarket Sites

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many supermarkets have been granted planning permission as a result of a planning inquiry or appeal since May 1997 on (i) out of town, (ii) green-field, (iii) town centre and (iv) brown-field sites. [74556]

Mr. Raynsford: Since May 1997 planning permission has been granted, as a result of a planning inquiry or appeal, in respect of ten supermarkets. Of these, none were out-of-town or on green-field sites, six were in town or district centres and the remaining four were out-of-centre, but within the urban area on brown-field sites.

Trunk Road Network

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce his decision on the extent of the core trunk road network following consultation on his paper, "Roads Review: Implementation of Detrunking Proposals". [74720]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Responses from regional planning bodies, local authorities and others are being considered. We will announce a final decision on the extent of the core network as soon as possible.

Rail Links

Mr. Linton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to consider (a) the order application for the link from London Underground's East London Line to Railtrack's South London Line and (b) the funding application for the southern link and the northern extension to the North London Line; and if he will assess the benefits of creating an orbital rail network for London. [74624]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Deputy Prime Minister gave permission for London Underground last August to do preparatory work for securing the legal powers necessary to build the southern extension to the East London Line. This work would need to be completed before an order application could be lodged.

London Transport and the Department are considering a number of ways in which both the Northern and Southern Extensions might be funded. Any appraisal of the extensions will take into account the benefit of establishing orbital railway links.

Planning Applications

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many applications for consideration of planning applications by public inquiry have been received by him since May 1997. [74536]

Mr. Raynsford: Comprehensive records are not kept centrally of requests to my right hon. Friend to call in planning applications. However, of those called in in the period 1 May 1997 to 31 December 1998, 239 applications have been or are due to be considered at a public inquiry.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many planning applications have been called in by him since May 1997. [74535]

Mr. Raynsford: For the 20 months from 1 May 1997 to 31 December 1998, my right hon. Friend called in some 246 planning applications.

Self-financing Trading Operations

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will (a) list and (b) estimate for each of the past three years applications by local authorities in England and Wales for trading credit approvals or other borrowing requirements for the development and maintenance of self-financing trading operations other than airports. [74702]

Ms Armstrong: In the last three years my Department has received a large number of applications for extra credit approvals for a wide range of purposes, including for Trading Credit Approvals (TCAs) for self-financing schemes. Owing to the constraints on my Department's resources, such requests could only be approved in the most exceptional circumstances. Local government in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the effect on the Public Sector borrowing requirement for 1999–2000 of approving all applications by local authorities in England and Wales for trading credit approvals or other borrowing requirements for the development and maintenance of self-financing trading operations other than airports for that period. [74703]

Ms Armstrong: Local authority applications for Trading Credit Approvals (TCAs) can be made at any time of the year and therefore it would not be possible to estimate the amount of requests for TCAs my Department might receive in 1999–2000 or future years. Were an application to be successful the PSBR for 1999–2000 would be expected to increase by the amount of the credit approval issued. Local government in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Advance Corporation Tax

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will estimate the financial impact of the changes made to advance corporation tax since May 1997 on local authority budgets for 1999–2000; [74948]

(2) if he will estimate the cost per council tax payer for 1999–2000 by local authority of the changes to advance corporation tax introduced since 1 May 1997. [74947]

Ms Armstrong: Actuarial assessments of the impact on local authority pension funds as a result of changes to advance corporation tax are not yet available for all funds. The Local Government Association, following a national survey last year, estimated the impact at £130 million. This was taken into account in the Revenue Support Grant Settlement for 1999–2000. It is not possible to say how these changes will impact on council tax. Local authorities will need to take into account all the relevant local circumstances in deciding on budgets and hence council taxes.

Sorting Office, Feltham

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he proposes to report on the planning application for a Royal Mail sorting office on the Feltham Marshalling yards site. [74886]

Mr. Caborn: We have decided not to intervene on this planning application and have written to the local planning authority today to tell them that they can determine the application as they see fit.

Merchant Ships

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many merchant ships joined the United Kingdom register during the last year for which figures are available; and if he will indicate their (a) names and (b) previous flags. [74965]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In 1998, 30 trading vessels of 100 gross tons and over joined the UK register. Their latest recorded names and previous flags are as follows:

Development Projects

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the development projects involving sites larger than one hectare in the South East which he has called in the past year. [75499]

Mr. Raynsford: In the period from 1 March 1998 to 28 February 1999 the Secretary of State has called-in 20 planning applications involving sites larger than one hectare in the South East. These are as follows:

Extension of a quarry and new cement works at Holborough Quarry, Snodland, Kent;

Leisure development at Stone Lodge, Dartford, Kent;

Conversion of a house and outbuildings to residential units, North Frith, Tonbridge, Kent;

Development of land for bagging and storing topsoil at Honeypot Farm, Edenbridge, Kent;

Leisure development at site of High School for Girls, Chichester, West Sussex;

Housing development, Grazeley, Wokingham, Berkshire;

Housing development, Spencers Wood, Wokingham, Berkshire;

Park and ride, Grain Silo, Cherwell, Oxon;

Multiplex cinema, Abingdon, Oxon.

Green Ministers

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the team of Green Ministers last met; what was discussed; and which departments were represented by officials. [75089]

Mr. Meacher: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 8 December 1998, Official Report, column 131, and also to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on 25 November 1998, Official Report, column 5. Those replies related to the last meeting of Green Ministers on 18 November 1998. The next meeting is scheduled for 22 March 1999.

Cycle Paths

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the Government's policy in respect of the use of cycle paths by invalid scooters. [75104]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Cycle tracks and mandatory cycle lanes are not generally available to invalid carriages, although advisory cycle lanes can by used. Local authorities can permit the use of Class 3 invalid carriages (those capable of a maximum speed of 4 mph on the footway and 8 mph on the carriageway) on mandatory cycle lanes.

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how crops grown in genetically modified crop trials are disposed of where the subsequent foods or food ingredients do not meet the requirements that would allow them to enter the food chain. [75112]

Mr. Meacher: The method of disposal is specified in each consent to release genetically modified crops. Methods for disposal include landfill, incineration, or autoclave. In addition to these methods, non-regenerative material may be disposed of by maceration or chemical treatment at the trial site and subsequent incorporation into the soil at the trial site.

Business Rates

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers are available to local authorities to encourage businesses to move to their areas through the waiving or reduction of business rates; and if he will make a statement. [75008]

Ms Armstrong: Local authorities do not have the power to waive or reduce business rates to attract businesses to their areas. However, we have proposed in the White Paper "Modern Local Government: In Touch with the People" (July 1998) a measure of local discretion over the business rate, which would allow an authority to grant a rebate to all of its ratepayers, though the cost of that rebate would have to be met by the authority. We shall shortly be issuing a public consultation paper on the details of implementing the White Paper proposals on rates.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make changes to the function and composition of local councils. [75075]

Mr. Raynsford: Our plans for the modernisation of local government are set out in the White Paper "Modern Local Government: In Touch with the People" published in July 1998. This is a programme for change stretching for ten years or more. The Local Government Bill (which provides for the replacement of Compulsory Competitive Tendering with the new duty to achieve best value in providing local services, and also abolishes crude and universal capping) completed its Committee stage in the House of Commons on 25 February. Our proposals to transform the political management and ethical framework of councils will be published soon in a draft Bill, and other measures will follow.

Local Authority Housing

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will announce the results of the consultation exercise on the proposed incentive for local authorities to buy back ex-council flats and houses. [75707]

Ms Armstrong: Around 200,000 people in England have bought a council flat, mainly under the Right to Buy. Research shows that the great majority consider it good value for money. But some, especially in system-built flats, cannot afford the costs of maintenance. Some cannot re-sell their home—either because they cannot find a buyer, or because mortgage lenders refuse to give a loan.

The Government already provide financial help to councils to reduce high repair bills in flats. But some people—including some older people on low incomes—can no longer cope with the cost and strain of home ownership. Local authorities have powers to buy back housing, but their resources are limited, and they have other pressures. Last July we published a consultation paper offering to cover 25 per cent. of councils' costs.

Many respondents were concerned that the incentive offered was too small. We have therefore increased it to 35 per cent. of all costs incurred by a council above a threshold of £50,000 per council per year. This will target help on those areas with the greatest problems. We have also extended it in other ways—for example, to cover homes already bought back during 1998–99, and to include former New Town housing.

In addition to this incentive, when a council buys back a property it regains a capital asset which, sooner or later, it can re-let. It also reduces the costs of managing its leasehold property including, for example, trying to recover arrears of service charges. And in some cases, such as buying from an elderly or vulnerable person in arrears, the council will be helping someone whom it might otherwise have to re-house.

Local authorities are best placed to decide who needs their help. They will be free to decide whom to assist and on what terms. there are just two restrictions: the incentive only applies where they are buying from an individual, and where they are not using compulsory purchase powers. This limits the incentive to cases there occupants wish to sell their home.

We have today laid an Order before Parliament amending regulation 104 of the Local Authorities (Capital Finance) Regulations 1997. Subject to Parliamentary approval, this will come into force on 1 April and councils will then be able to use the financial incentive. A copy of the consultation paper, and a list of the responses, is in the Library of the House, and copies of the responses are available in the Library of the Department.

PRIME MINISTER

Minister for Science

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Prime Minister what instructions he has issued relating to the Minister for Science's attendance at, or participation in, meetings where genetically modified foods and crops are discussed. [73026]

The Prime Minister: It has not been necessary to issue any such instructions.

At all times the Minister for Science has acted in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code and the statement he made at the time he became a Minister.

Train Operating Companies

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 24 February 1999, Official Report, column 383, what criteria he uses to evaluate the (a) quality of service and (b) customer satisfaction provided by train operating companies. [74153]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 2 March 1999]: Quality and customer satisfaction are currently measured against benchmarks in passengers' Charters and franchise agreements. As I made clear at the Rail Summit on 25 February, this Government are committed to improving the quality of rail services, and believes that transport generally is as important as schools and hospitals.

The Summit demonstrated our determination to improve rail services. Sir Alastair Morton, as the new Chairman of the British Railways Board and prospective Chairman of the Strategic Rail Authority, will have a key role in raising standards and boosting investment. We also made clear that we need better measurements of quality and customer satisfaction.

Single Currency

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on procedures for (a) democratic accountability and (b) official representations on economic management permitted from (i) national Governments and (ii) parliamentarians from countries within the euro zone, concerning management of the single currency; and what analysis he has made of such in determining whether the United Kingdom should join EMU. [74446]

The Prime Minister: Article 109b(3) of the Maastricht Treaty contains several provisions designed to balance the necessary independence of the European Central Bank with the need for democratic accountability. The Government believe that accountability and transparency in their policy-making will be key to ensuring that the European Central Bank gains the trust of the European public and financial markets. Ultimately, it will help to provide the credibility needed to deliver a more effective monetary policy.

Euro

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister what estimate he has made of total costs to (a) public services and (b) government departments of preparations for transition to the euro; and if he will make a statement. [74499]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 529.

Racism

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what arrangements are being proposed to guard against institutional racism in the public sector as a whole, with particular reference to new tests, guidelines and monitoring arrangements; and if he will make a statement. [75136]

The Prime Minister: The Government have accepted the definition of institutional racism set out in the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report and have welcomed the Report's recommendations. A detailed response and action plan will be laid before the House in time for the debate on the Report.

As my right hon. Friend made clear in his statement to the House on 24 February 1999, Official Report, columns 389–403, the Report is a challenge to all public services and the Government are committed to a comprehensive agenda to improve race relations which will set out over the coming months. This will include extending the Race Relations Act 1976 to cover public services.

Newspaper Articles

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister if he will arrange for copies of articles which he writes for publication in overseas journals and newspapers to be deposited in the Library, together with a translation. [75051]

The Prime Minister: No central store is routinely kept of such articles and it would not be practical to make systematic arrangements to do so.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what representations he has received from (i) foreign Governments, (ii) foreign agencies, (iii) foreign media and (iv) British lobbyists concerning potential writing of articles for placement in foreign newspapers and journals; [75050]

(2) what representations he has received from overseas on articles which he has written in foreign newspapers and journals. [75049]

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, none.

Geneva Trade and Environment Symposium

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister who will represent the British Government at the High Level Symposium on Trade and Environment in Geneva on 15 and 16 March 1999; what policy position the Government will be promoting; and if he will make a statement. [74869]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 March 1999]: We will be represented at the World Trade Organisation Symposium on Trade and Environment by senior officials from the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Department for International Development, and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. We expect the event to be an opportunity to work with other WTO members and representatives of non-governmental bodies, including business, to identify constructive ways ahead on the trade and environment interface.

The Symposium is not intended to be a forum for negotiation or decision-making, but we hope that the event will progress the trade and environment debate by helping to:

Clarify the relationship between trade rules and international Environmental law;

Identify mutually-beneficial solutions for achieving trade, environment and development objectives;

Encourage further dialogue between all interested communities, in particular highlighting the importance of transparency at both the national and international level.

The United Kingdom will engage constructively in the debate at the Symposium.

Genetic Modification

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 527, on genetic modification, on what basis he stated that genetic modification has the potential for the production of food that is more nutritious and better tasting. [75061]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 March 1999]: This is the view of eminent scientific opinion. In its report on 'Genetically Modified Plants for Food Use' published in September 1998, the Royal Society say that 'the use of genetically modified organisms has the potential to offer real benefits in agricultural practice, food quality, nutrition and health'.

Biotechnology

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Prime Minister when he last met environmental groups with an interest in biotechnology; and who was present at the meeting. [75063]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 March 1999]: As under previous Administrations, it is not the normal practice to provide details of private meetings with specific individuals or organisations.

UNSCOM

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister on what date he was informed that the American Government were running a signals intelligence operation under the cover of UNSCOM. [75408]

The Prime Minister: I am aware of the latest press allegations of the United States spying under cover of UNSCOM operations.

The US Government have publicly stated that all activities by US nationals assigned to UNSCOM, and all information exchanges between the US and UNSCOM have been strictly in pursuit of UNSCOM's mandate to dismantle Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD) capability.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer by the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution of 23 February 1999, Official Report, column 212, on Lockerbie, if he will define which aspects of the Lockerbie issue will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament, and which for the UK Parliament. [75280]

The Prime Minister: Scottish criminal procedure and the Scottish criminal justice system will be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament. International relations will remain the responsibility of the United Kingdom Government.

Lord Chancellor (Garrick Club)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Prime Minister what action he has taken in respect of the Lord Chancellor's use of his private office to promote a candidate for membership of the Garrick Club. [75153]

The Prime Minister: None. The Lord Chancellor did not use his Private Office to promote a candidate for membership of the Garrick Club. His Private Office was involved in preparing and despatching some letters on the Lord Chancellor's behalf. This was an oversight and the costs have been reimbursed.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Paramilitary Violence

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list for the week ended Saturday 6 February the number of (a) violent incidents involving paramilitary groups, (b) punishment beatings and (c) punishment shootings which took place in Northern Ireland, indicating how many involved (i) Loyalist and (ii) Republican groups. [70902]

Mr. Ingram: Between 31 January and 6 February 1999, there were 4 shooting incidents and 1 bombing incident. The number of casualties as a result of paramilitary-style attacks were as follows:

	By Loyalists	By Republicans

[70901]

Mr. Ingram: Between 24 and 30 January 1999, there were 4 shooting and 2 bombing incidents. The number of casualties as a result of paramilitary-style attacks were as follows:

Total	8	6

Note:
Figures may be subject to minor amendment in the light of further information becoming available

Good Friday Agreement

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the timetable for normalising security in Northern Ireland under the Good Friday Agreement. [71399]

Mr. Ingram: The Government will make progress towards the objective of as early a return as possible to normal security arrangements in Northern Ireland, consistent with the level of threat. The situation is kept under constant review.

Graffiti

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the cost was to the public purse in each of the past five years to clean up graffiti on public buildings in Northern Ireland. [72912]

Mr. Paul Murphy: This information is not recorded in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Pilot Projects

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the pilot projects instigated by his Department since 1 May 1997, indicating the area in which each pilot took, or is taking, place. [72636]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department is funding five pilot schemes to promote the voluntary recording of archaeological finds in Kent, Norfolk, North Lincolnshire, the North-West and Yorkshire for two and a half years from September 1997 to April 2000.

Departmental Policies

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what systems he has in place to ensure that policies being developed by his Department are subject to a crime impact (a) assessment and (b) audit and are not likely to lead to enhanced criminal opportunities. [72694]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 24 February 1999]: Departments co-operate on policy development and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State works closely with other Ministers in assessing any likely implications for crime of new developments, in support of the Home Office's aim to reduce crime and the fear of it.

The procedures for crime assessment and audit vary across the Department's responsibilities. Where a policy is assessed as carrying some risk, for example where grants are made to third parties, specific systems are in place. Relevant sponsored bodies such as the national museums and galleries, Historic Royal Palaces, and English Heritage have security systems to guard against theft and criminal damage and we expect our sponsored bodies to keep these systems under review, to ensure they are appropriately effective in developing circumstances. The Department and its sponsored bodies have fraud policies in place and the Department has developed a checklist of key controls to prevent, detect and investigate fraud and deal with its consequences. The Department is committed to producing an annual fraud return to the Treasury's timetable each year.

From this year onwards, Departmental and NDPB Accounting Officers will be required to prepare statements on the system of internal financial control which operates in their organisations, including risk management. In preparation for this, my Department is about to pilot Control and Risk Self Assessment (CRSA) techniques in a number of policy areas.

The National Lottery regulator also has systems to ensure that those associated with the running of the National Lottery are fit and proper for their role and to monitor the effectiveness of the operator's systems to guard against crime including fraud.

British Airways

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he last met representatives of British Airways; what was discussed; what help his Department is receiving from British Airways and if British Airways is financially sponsoring initiatives run by his Department or its agencies. [72810]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 February 1999]: I have no formal meetings with representatives of British Airways in that capacity. From time to time, however, both as Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and as Chairman of the Millennium Commission, I have met Bob Ayling, the Chief Executive of British Airways, in his capacity as Chairman of the New Millennium Experience Company.

Neither my Department nor The Royal Parks Agency is receiving any help or financial sponsorship from British Airways. However, British Airways has for some years been providing financial sponsorship for the Art for Architecture scheme, for which my Department is the core-funder.

UK Sports Institute

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on what dates he has visited the headquarters site of the UK Sports Institute since December 1997. [73563]

Mr. Banks [holding answer 26 February 1999]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I visited the Sheffield headquarters site of the UKSI on 26 January 1998 and I returned for a second visit on 18 June. We have had several meetings with the UKSC, ESC, Sheffield City Council and the Phoenix consortium throughout this development period to track progress; the most recent one took place on 26 January this year. I will be visiting the site again in April.

Libraries

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what advice is given by his Department on the provision of locally available, accessible libraries. [73161]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 1 March 1999]: Local library authorities have a statutory duty to provide comprehensive and efficient services and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has recently reminded them of his own statutory obligation to ensure that they do so. The Public Libraries and Museums Act 1964 does not specify the number, location, distribution or opening hours of local libraries. These detailed decisions are for local library authorities to make, based on the precise nature of their areas and their local resources and priorities. However, through their Annual Library Plans, library authorities are required by my right hon. Friend to report on the availability and accessibility of local libraries, which is a key element in ensuring that a comprehensive and efficient service is being provided, and he subsequently provides both individual and general feedback to each authority.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received concerning the future of Kilburn, Chalk Farm and Belsize public libraries in Camden; and if he will make a statement. [75186]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 5 March 1999]: To date, I have received 23 representations about these public libraries. I am looking at Camden's proposals for its library services in detail to ensure that they meet with statutory requirements and do not result in a reduction in service quality across the authority.

Sports Cabinet

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the members of the Sports Cabinet; and when it has met. [74558]

Mr. Banks [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The Sports Cabinet is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, and brings together the Ministers with responsibility for Sport in the four parts of the United Kingdom and, when appropriate, others who are closely involved in the development of sport.

The Sports Cabinet last met on 26 November 1998 and is scheduled to meet next on 10 March. Officials of my Department have met their counterparts from the Home Country Departments on a number of occasions during this period and are in regular contact on a range of issues that relate to elite performance and of strategic priority for UK sport.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Biological Resources (Poorer Countries)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development in respect of their impact on poorer countries, what assessment her Department has made of the compatibility of Article 27 of TRIPS and Articles 8, 15 and 16 of the UN Convention on Biological Resources. [74844]

Clare Short: The World Trade Organisation Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) Agreement and the UN Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD) are complementary. They both seek to establish common international frameworks and obligations within which individual countries may develop legislative regimes appropriate to their circumstances.

There are concerns about the way in which the two instruments can be implemented in a mutually supportive way. Given the interests of developing countries, many of which have indigenous and local communities which depend on local biodiversity for their livelihoods and welfare, we have funded an independent assessment of the implementation issues. This has been published and is being placed in the Library of the House.

Articles 8, 15 and 16 of the CBD refer to the rights of indigenous people, access to genetic material and transfer of technology respectively. Article 27 of the TRIPS agreement deals with the application of intellectual property rights to plant and animal material. Regarding compatibility with Article 8 of the CBD on the rights of indigenous people, patents can protect only new technical contributions. Rights cannot be obtained which cover existing knowledge. Regarding Article 15 of the CBD on access to genetic material, it is for individual contracting States to the CBD to set the conditions for access and it is not a matter for TRIPS or intellectual property regimes. Regarding Article 16 of the CBD, both the CBD and the TRIPs agreement encourage the transfer of technology.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has received from developing countries on their attitude towards genetic modification issues; what assessment she has made of them; and if she will make a statement. [75105]

Clare Short: I have received no direct representations on these issues. We will publish a paper later this month outlining our work on genetically modified organisms and how we propose to assist developing countries to strengthen their capacity to handle these important issues.

Iran (Aid)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the provision of aid to Iran. [75350]

Clare Short: We do not have a programme of assistance for Iran. We do provide support to Iraqi and Afghan refugees in Iran, both bilaterally and through contributions to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Since April 1996, we have spent nearly £1.2 million bilaterally. We also provide emergency aid in response to natural disasters in the region.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Civil Aerospace Research

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what forms of Government support are available for civil aerospace research in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) Germany; and what level of funding was provided by each in 1997–98. [74533]

Mr. Battle: In the UK, the Civil Aircraft Research and Technology Demonstration (CARAD) Programme supports long-term research in key aeronautics technologies by providing grants for industry and for funding work undertaken at the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) or placed by DERA in industry and universities. In 1997–8, funding totalled £24.6 million. Additionally, in the three years ending 1997–98, £12 million was targeted through the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council's (EPSRC) industrially led Innovative Manufacture Initiative (IMI) Aerospace Programme. For further information about the EPSRC programme, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on 7 December 1998, Official Report, columns 67–68.

For France, our best estimate of expenditure in 1997 (calendar year) on CARAD—equivalent support is about £50 million. For Germany, our best estimate for 1998 (calendar year) is about £90 million.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies and academic establishments have received funds through the CARAD programme in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; what areas of research have been sponsored by the programme; and what assessment he has made of the benefits of the programme. [74532]

Mr. Battle: In 1997–98, 47 companies and 22 universities received CARAD funds; similar numbers are expected to receive funds for the financial year 1998–99. Areas of research sponsored include aerodynamics, propulsion systems, materials and structures, aircraft systems and rotorcraft (which was subject to a moratorium on new support from February 1998). Copies of the CARAD Annual Report for 1997–98 have been placed in the Library of the House.

The research programmes supported by CARAD over the years have made a significant contribution to the technological competitiveness of our industry, including wider benefits outside aeronautics.

Fire-retardant Chemicals

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which fire retardant chemicals are authorised for use in consumer goods in the United Kingdom. [74956]

Dr. Howells: There is not an authorised list of flame-retardant chemicals used in consumer goods. The use of chemicals is governed by "The Chemical (Hazard Information and Packaging for Supply) Regulations 1994", as amended, and "The Dangerous Substances and Preparations (Safety) (Consolidation) Regulations 1994", as amended.

A recent report by the University of Surrey for the Department of Trade and Industry on "Risks and Benefits in the Use of Flame Retardants in Consumer Products" gives an indication of the types and quantity of flame-retardant chemicals used in consumer products. A copy of this report is available in the Library.

Researchers

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 21 January 1999, Official Report, column 547, on researchers, if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting of the new RCI steering group. [72896]

Mr. Battle: The new group has its first meeting on Thursday 18 March. I understand that the Minister for Science would be pleased to consider making a response to the meeting's outcome.

Fireworks

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 22 February 1999, Official Report, column 89, when he expects to place the final firework safety figure for 1998 in the Library. [75183]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 March 1999]: A summary report of the 1998 injuries is being sent to the printer and copies will be placed in the Library of the House as soon as they are available. I will inform the House when this has been done. The full report, complete with analytical tables, should be available in mid-April and copies will be placed in the Library.

Internal Market Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Internal Market Council held in Brussels on 25 February; and if he will make a statement. [74198]

Mr. Wilson: My noble Friend the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe represented the UK at the Internal Market Council in Brussels on 25 February.

The Commission introduced an open debate on the follow-up to the Single Market Action Plan since this expired at the end of 1998. There was general support for a follow-up which maintains political commitment by setting targets and deadlines for improving the operation of the Single Market, taking into account the needs of business and consumers. In an open debate on simplification, there was agreement that SLIM (Simpler Legislation in the Internal Market) was an important initiative, but more effort was required to deliver concrete results. The Council welcomed the Business Test Panel initiative, which is intended to improve consultation with business on the likely impact of selected legislative proposals.

The Council agreed Conclusions on the economic reform process agreed at the Cardiff Council under the UK Presidency. These identify priority areas for further development of the Single Market and are also designed to assist ECOFIN in their consideration of Broad Economic Policy Guidelines. The Commission presented a study carried out by the National Economic Research Associates on parallel imports; a debate on this will take place at the June IMC.

The Commission presented reports on: Community patents; a Green Paper on counterfeiting and piracy; and two directives on Third Country Nationals; and gave a progress report on Community design.

Over lunch, Ministers discussed the environment and the Single Market, and the Artists' Resale Right Directive. The Presidency concluded that in view of the remaining difficulties some member states had with the proposed Directive on Artists' Resale Rights, COREPER should examine this further with the aim of reaching early agreement.

Ente Poste Italiane

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made, pursuant to European Communities State Aid Examination 1999/C 28/05, on Ente Poste Italiane; and if he will make a statement. [75083]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend has made no representations on this case. The Government intervene in cases only where substantive legal or policy issues are raised. The Commission has exclusive competence to take decisions on state aid.

University Lecturers

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the ability of British university lecturers to find employment at French universities; and if he will make a statement. [74403]

Mr. Wilson: My Department has received no representations on this subject.

Teachers

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the ability of British teachers to find teaching positions in German schools; and if he will make a statement. [74398]

Mr. Wilson: Since 1 May 1997, my Department has received written representations from 10 teachers concerning difficulties involved in obtaining recognition in Germany of their UK Qualified Teacher Status.

My officials have, where appropriate, taken up individual complaints with the German authorities and the European Commission, with a view to ensuring that Germany complies fully with its Single Market obligations in this respect. My officials also provide more general continuing advice, assistance and support to British-trained teachers in their dealings with the German authorities.

Secondhand Goods (Sales)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) United Kingdom and (b) European legislation regulates the sale of secondhand goods; and if he will make a statement. [75010]

Dr. Howells: Consumers have the same rights in UK law when they buy secondhand goods as when they buy new ones. The Sale of Goods Act 1979 requires goods sold by traders to be of satisfactory quality. The test of quality is what a reasonable person would find satisfactory, taking into account the price, how the goods are described and other relevant factors such as age. If, taking account of these considerations, a buyer finds the goods are not of satisfactory quality when he initially examines or tries them out, he can reject them and seek a refund. If a fault, of which the buyer could not reasonably be unaware when he bought the goods, manifests itself after he has accepted the goods he is entitled to claim compensation (such as the cost of repair or money back). The buyer can claim compensation for up to six years after purchase in England, Wales and Northern Ireland and up to five years after the goods have caused loss in Scotland.

Traders selling new or second hand goods must also comply with general consumer protection legislation, such as the Trade Descriptions Act 1968.

The proposed EC Directive on the Sale of Consumer Goods, expected to be adopted later this year for implementation by 1 January 2002, applies to both second hand and new goods. If goods sold are not in conformity with the contract, the Directive will give consumers the remedies of repair or replacement whichever is more economical, in relation to defects, present when the goods were bought, for up to two years afterwards. The Directive gives additional remedies of price reduction or rescission of the contract when repair or replacement of faulty goods is not possible.

In addition to Sale of Goods legislation, there is a considerable body of Community and domestic legislation setting out safety requirements for specific kinds of goods, including second hand goods.

Unsolicited Faxes

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to introduce legislation to prohibit the sending of unsolicited faxes. [75074]

Mr. Wills: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) of 27 January 1999, Official Report, column 284.

Plutonium Shipments (Japan)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 22 February 1999, Official Report, column 97, on plutonium shipments to Japan, when he expects the contracts for MOX shipments by BNFL to be signed; and what role his Department will play in the negotiations. [74972]

Mr. Battle: The timing and terms of contracts for the shipment of nuclear materials are linked to the operational and commercial requirements of customers and are matters for the companies concerned to agree. These are not matters in which the Government is directly involved.

Ethical Trading Initiative

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the actions his Department is taking to promote the Ethical Trading Initiative among UK companies; [75236]

(2) what action his Department is taking to promote the establishment of internal systems in UK companies for the implementation and external verification of ethical practices. [75235]

Mr. Wilson: My Department has made it clear that, along with other interested departments, we fully support the aims of the Ethical Trading Initiative—as one of the important initiatives being taken currently by the voluntary sector—to promote a culture of social responsibility among British companies. We have enjoyed regular contacts, at both official and ministerial level, with the ETI and applaud their efforts to develop and promote corporate codes of conduct relating to companies' dealings with their overseas suppliers, and have given them all the support they have called for.

Oil Exploration (St. Kilda)

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his Department has had with the Scottish Office regarding the impact of oil exploration near St Kilda. [73929]

Mr. Battle: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 2 March 1999, Official Report, columns 693–95.

Genetic Resources Patenting

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations he had with MAFF, the Department of Health and the Department for International Development on the formulation of Government policy on patenting genetic resources for food and agriculture. [74473]

Mr. Battle: The patenting of genetic resources for food and agriculture, as with all areas of technology, is governed by the Patents Act 1977. In July 1998, an EC Directive on the Legal Protection of Biotechnological Inventions was adopted with the aim of clarifying and harmonising the patent legislation of all Member States for such inventions. During the negotiations on this Directive my Department consulted closely with other Departments including MAFF, the Department of Health and the Department for International Development. These links have been maintained since the adoption of the Directive.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Zimbabwe

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what official visits he, his ministers or officials have paid to Zimbabwe since May 1997; whom they met; and what was discussed. [73556]

Mr. Straw: No Ministerial visits have been paid to Zimbabwe over this period.

One official visited Zimbabwe in August 1998 to assess a penal report project which the Department for International Development (DFID) had funded. He met senior Government legal officers and staff from non-governmental organisations.

One official visited Harare in September 1997 and September and November 1998 to undertake carriers' liability training and made liaison visits to British Airways and Air Zimbabwe. Two Immigration Service officials paid similar visits to Air Zimbabwe in February 1999.

One official provided consultancy services to the Zimbabwe police in October 1998 in relation to record keeping.

One official is currently on a DFID-funded secondment to the Zimbabwe Police Department to review and advise on the collection of crime statistics in Zimbabwe.

In addition, two police officers, from Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary, were attached to the Zimbabwe fraud and anti-corruption unit from 18 April 1997 for 18 days.

Asylum and Immigration White Paper

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a summary and analysis of the responses to the 1997 White Paper on asylum and immigration. [73890]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The White Paper published in July 1998 set out the Government's policy proposals and did not seek views on specific issues. In those circumstances, we took the view that the best approach was to publish a list of respondents and their full comments rather than attempt an extensive summary and analysis of the responses. A list of respondents, together with copies of their comments, was placed in the Libraries on 17 December.

Elections (Sundays)

Mr. Linton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce measures to allow (a) elections to be held on Sundays and (b) the European election to be held on Sunday 13 June. [74685]

Mr. George Howarth: We have no plans at present to introduce polling at the weekend for Parliamentary or European Parliamentary elections. We are, however, considering the possibility of pilot studies of this and other alternative electoral procedures at local elections.

Fire Engines (Accidents)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been (a) injured or (b) killed in each year since 1990 as a result of an accident involving a fire engine answering a 999 call. [74631]

Mr. George Howarth: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Au Pairs

Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many au pairs were registered with the police under the terms of the au pair scheme in (a) May 1997, (b) July 1998 and (c) the latest month for which figures are available. [74488]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Statistical information about the number of "au pairs" who registered with the police because of the imposition of such a requirement by an immigration officer on entry is not available. However, the table showing the number of "au pairs" given leave to enter the United Kingdom in the specified months gives a strong indication of the number who might have been expected to have a registration requirement imposed.

As a result of the changes to the scope of the Police Registration Scheme which came into effect on 11 May 1998, only those foreign nationals from the countries or territories listed in Appendix 2 of the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules will normally be required to register with the police from that date. This means that it is only "au pairs" from Turkey who will normally have been required to register with the police since then.

The figures in this table have been rounded to three significant digits, or to the nearest 10 if fewer than 1000; because of this the sum of the constituent items may not agree with the total as shown.

Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the costs saved since August 1998, following the relaxation of the rules requiring au pairs to register with the police after being in the United Kingdom for six months. [74489]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The Police Registration Scheme is administered by the police on a cost recovery basis, with the current fee standing at £34. Until the scope of the Police Registration Scheme was amended on 11 May 1998 "au pairs" given leave to enter the United Kingdom for a period of over six months were required, as a condition of that leave, to register with the police within seven days of arrival. Since that date only foreign nationals from the countries or territories listed in Appendix 2 to the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules should normally be required to register. The changes to the scope of the registration scheme in respect of "au pairs" have not resulted in any cost saving to the police or central Home Office.

Juvenile Secure Accommodation

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the Government plan to take forward their programme of reform of juvenile secure accommodation; and if he will make a statement. [75814]

Mr. Straw: The Government set out their programme of reform of the current arrangements for the provision of juvenile secure accommodation on 29 July 1998, Official Report, columns 255–56. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 provided the courts with more appropriate remand and sentencing powers to deal with the most serious and persistent young offenders, as well as giving the police and the courts new powers to deal with other young offenders more effectively in the community. To complement these provisions, the Government are seeking to establish a range of secure accommodation appropriate to the age and maturity of young people and with regimes which address offending behaviour, and to develop intervention programmes which will support the new multi-agency youth offending teams under the 1998 Act in working with young offenders in the community.

Since July 1998, the Government have set up an 18-month pilot project in ten areas to pave the way for introducing youth offending teams across England and Wales in April 2000 and the final warning scheme and new court orders in 2000–2001. The Youth Justice Board for England and Wales was established in September and is responsible for administering a development fund of £85 million over three years from April 1999, which is being used to develop bail support initiatives and other community-based intervention programmes to support the final warning scheme and new court orders.

The Government have also taken forward the necessary arrangements for implementing on 1 June 1999 the provisions in the 1998 Act for court-ordered remands to local authority secure accommodation of 12, 13 and 14-year-old boys and girls, 15 and 16-year-old girls and, where a place has been identified in advance, vulnerable 15 and 16-year-old boys. This will ensure that the courts have the powers they need in dealing with those young people the seriousness of whose alleged offending means that they cannot be dealt with safely in the community.

The Prison Service is finalising its plans for a distinct estate within its accommodation for 15 to 17-year-old boys remanded or sentenced to custody, with improved levels of care and regimes delivered within it. The Prison Service has also reviewed its arrangements for accommodating 15 to 17-year-old girls.

The Youth Justice Board has provided initial advice on a range of youth custody issues and a copy of this has been placed in the Library. It will help to inform the Government's longer-term thinking about the provision of juvenile secure accommodation. The Board is now preparing more detailed advice on regime standards which, together with work being undertaken by the Prison Service, will help in preparing for the detention and training order under the 1998 Act.

A key element in improved regimes and in the operation of the detention and training order will be better links between custodial facilities, where the first half of the sentence will be served, and the community, where the second half will be served. The new youth offending teams will have a vital role in managing these links—a member of the team will be expected to be involved in sentence planning and throughcare whilst the young offender is in custody and then supervise them when they return to the community. Given this connection, the Government have decided to accept the recommendation in the Youth Justice Board's advice that the detention and training order should be implemented at the same time as the local structure of youth offending teams, that is April 2000. Ahead of this, the Prison Service will put in place arrangements for the distinct estate for boys in its accommodation and for improved regimes.

The Government have concluded that establishing distinct units for the very small number of 15 to 17-year-old girls held in Prison Service accommodation is not the best way forward, or in their best interests. The introduction of the detention and training order will allow for greater flexibility in the placement of sentenced young people. It is our intention to make use of this flexibility by placing sentenced 15 and 16-year-old girls in available non-Prison Service accommodation, when the detention and training order is in force. The first priority will be to place the youngest and most vulnerable young women outside the Prison Service. In the short term, arrangements within the Prison Service for holding 17-year-old women, and other young women for whom other accommodation is not available, will be improved by establishing discrete units for young women under the age of 21, with enhanced regimes within these.

The Government are also taking forward detailed work on the proposed extension of the role of the Youth Justice Board to act as the commissioning and purchasing body for all forms of secure accommodation for children and young people on remand and under sentence. This should help to achieve the appropriate volume, type and spread of accommodation in the longer term, so that individual needs can be met more effectively.

Life Prisoners

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders sentenced to life imprisonment have been granted an oral hearing before the parole board in the last five years. [75351]

Mr. George Howarth: The readily available information, which relates to the number of oral hearings held by the Parole Board, is published in the Board's annual reports. The most recent report, for 1997–98, records the number of such hearings as:

Year	Number
1993	265
1994	121
1995–96	216
1997–98	278

These figures include some second and subsequent hearings for life sentenced prisoners who were not released following their first hearing.

HMP Lewes

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) phone calls and (b) letters have been received at Her Majesty's Prison Lewes since 1 May 1997 from local residents complaining of noise nuisance. [75097]

Mr. George Howarth: Since 1 May 1997, Lewes prison has received 16 letters from local residents about noise disturbance. A telephone log only began on 23 October 1997. Since then, Lewes has received 18 calls from local residents about noise disturbance.

Various measures have been taken to eliminate this problem, including the fitting of corrective brackets to cell windows. This work was undertaken on the advice of the Environmental Health Department and was completed in October 1998. Since this time no further written complaints have been received. Only one telephone complaint was received by the prison in the last month.

Immigration

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the status of the Immigration Services Commissioner, indicating the regulatory powers which apply to him. [74752]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The status and regulatory powers of the Immigration Services Commissioner are set out in Part V of, and Schedules 5 and 6 to, the Immigration and Asylum Bill.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the fast-track immigration appeals system for weddings and funerals; and what plans he has to prevent abuse. [74754]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Immigration and Asylum Bill contains provisions which will allow applicants who are refused entry clearance to visit a family member in the United Kingdom to appeal against the decision.

Applicants will have to pay a fee to appeal. The fee will depend on whether an applicant opts for a hearing on the papers or a full oral hearing. Applicants whose appeals are allowed will have their fee refunded.

In order to prevent abuse, the Bill also contains provisions to enable the Secretary of State to accept a security with a view to securing that an applicant will, if given permission to enter the United Kingdom for a limited period, leave at the end of the period.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what level the bond for those on family visits will be set. [74756]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have not yet decided at what level bonds will be set. This will be one of the issues addressed in a consultation on a pilot bond scheme, which we shall issue later this year.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the provision of legal representation for those appealing against immigration detention. [74758]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Detainees who are challenging the legality of their detention by way of a writ of habeas corpus (judicial review in Scotland) are entitled to legal aid.

Detainees may apply to the independent Immigration Appellate Authority for bail and can receive free representation from either the Immigration Advisory Service or Refugee Legal Centre under the grant in aid payments allowed for under section 23 of the Immigration Act 1971.

A detainee who prefers to be represented at a bail or appeal hearing by a solicitor or other representative must fund the application themselves.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what rights of appeal defendants will have against decisions by immigration office officials. [74753]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government's proposals for a new system of appeals in immigration and asylum cases are set out in Part IV of the Immigration and Asylum Bill.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for judicial scrutiny of the Immigration Services Commissioner. [74757]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Any person aggrieved by a relevant decision of the Commissioner may appeal to the Immigration Services Tribunal against the decision. A determination of the Immigration Services Tribunal will be subject to judicial review.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have to pilot the payments in kind benefit system for asylum seekers; and what minimum standards will apply. [74755]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: No decisions have yet been taken on which aspects of the new support arrangements for asylum seekers it might be possible to pilot. However, we will be monitoring closely the non-statutory interim arrangements for dispersing asylum seekers which are being set up by the local government associations. There will be a statutory requirement that accommodation provided must be adequate for the needs of the asylum seeker and his dependants, if any, and that essential living needs should be met.

Visas (Supply Teachers)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, columns 598–99, on visas for supply teachers, what are the terms and conditions of the concession; when it was introduced; and for what reasons. [75292]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Young Commonwealth citizens, between the ages of 17 and 27 inclusive, may be admitted to the United Kingdom for an extended holiday of up to two years. Although working holidaymakers would normally be precluded from continuing their careers in the United Kingdom those in the teaching profession may do so provided such work is incidental to their holiday and the remainder of the Immigration Rules are met. This means that they cannot take full-time work for more than half of their stay here. For the purposes of the working holidaymaker scheme full-time work is more than 25 hours a week.

I am making further inquiries about the other information requested and I will write to the hon. Member.

Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what checks his Department made prior to the publication of the now withdrawn appendices of the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry report to ensure that no member of the public was put in danger by the information provided; and if he will make a statement. [75283]

Mr. Straw: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) on 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 760.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the report into unauthorised publication of extracts from the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry report ordered by his Permanent Secretary; and if he will make a statement. [75284]

Mr. Straw: No. It is not the practice to publish leak inquiry reports. I have undertaken to inform the House of the outcome of the investigation when they are known.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 567, on the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry, for what reasons it would not be in the interests of the investigation into the leak of parts of the Macpherson report to provide the information requested by the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire. [75409]

Mr. Straw: The details sought by the right hon. Member need to be established, along with other matters, by the independent investigator. It would not be appropriate for me to pre-empt that work.

Remand Prisoners

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently on remand; and what has been the (a) average, (b) median and (c) maximum period for which prisoners have been held on remand in each of the last three years. [75412]

Mr. George Howarth: Provisional information for 26 February shows that there were 12,627 persons held on remand in prisons in England and Wales. Information on the estimated average number of days in custody for untried and convicted unsentenced prisoners over the last three years is given in table 1. This information is also published in "Prison statistics England and Wales" (table 2.2 of the 1997 edition, Cm 4017), a copy of which is in the Library. Information on the estimated median time in custody is given in table 2. No information is collected centrally regarding the maximum time held on remand.

European Elections

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements he is making to scrutinise the counting of votes at the forthcoming European elections; how he intends to ensure that the votes across the country are verified and correlated; who will be in national charge of the election; and if he will make a statement. [75012]

Mr. George Howarth: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary hopes to be able to lay regulations to govern the conduct of European Parliamentary elections before the House very shortly.

Our intention is that votes should be verified on a Parliamentary constituency basis as soon as practicable after the polls close on Thursday 10 June.

Counting of the votes, however, may not begin until the polls have closed in the last European Union member state on the evening of Sunday 13 June.

Counting will be conducted at Parliamentary constituency level though where the same person is the acting returning officer for two or more Parliamentary constituencies he or she will be able to combine them for polling and counting purposes. Local results will be communicated to the regional returning officers who will perform the seat allocation calculations for each of the 11 electoral regions.

It is a long established tradition that local returning officers have responsibility for the conduct of the election in their areas and we do not propose to change that.

DEFENCE

HMS Cromer

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies were carried out which led to the decision to dispose of HMS 'Cromer'. [71663]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 22 February 1999]: As we announced in the Strategic Defence Review, the modernisation of the mine countermeasures force will continue but the increase in the number of vessels should be limited to 22 rather than 25 as previously planned. This will be achieved by paying off three of the older or least capable ships. No decisions have yet been taken as to which vessels will be paid off, although HMS Cromer is a candidate.

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the cost of construction of HMS 'Cromer', (b) the cost of the cancelled refit of HMS 'Cromer' and (c) the cost of the short refit planned for HMS 'Cromer' for February to July. [71676]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 22 February 1999]: The information requested is as follows:

(a) The total cost of construction of HMS Cromer was £23.8 million plus an estimated £12 to £13 million for Government Furnished Equipment.

(b) I cannot say what the cost of HMS Cromer's cancelled refit might have been, as this would have been dependent on the outcome of contract negotiations, the cost of materials and any additional work which might have emerged during the refit. However, the broad order costs for refits of vessels of the same class have been around £5 million.

(c) The planned cost of HMS Cromer's reduced refit is about £2.5 million, but this does not include the costs of any unforeseen work.

Aircraft (In-service Dates)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's definition of in-service date for (a) Eurofighter, (b) Merlin helicopters and (c) C130 aircraft. [72646]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is as follows:

Eurofighter—delivery of first aircraft.

Merlin HM Mk 1—delivery of twelfth aircraft.

Merlin HC Mk 3—delivery of sixth aircraft.

Hercules C130J—delivery of twelfth aircraft.

Belize (Jungle Training)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the benefits of the jungle training exercises in Belize carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72783]

Mr. Doug Henderson: This exercise, involving a Commando Group of Royal Marines, was intended to maintain and develop their capability to conduct operations in a jungle environment, and is assessed to have succeeded in its aim.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the jungle training exercises in Belize carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72784]

Mr. Doug Henderson: These exercises are assessed as having succeeded in their aim of developing the jungle warfare capability of the infantry units which participated in them.

Exercises (Canada)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the benefits of the six armoured battlegroup exercises in Canada carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72779]

(2) how many personnel were deployed on the six armoured battlegroup exercises in Canada carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72780]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Due to the deployment to Bosnia of a unit scheduled to take part in the armoured battlegroup exercises in Canada, only five armoured battlegroup exercises, involving 6,005 personnel, were carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. These exercises were designed to train the participating units to a level where they can be deployed operationally through participating in high intensity operations using live firing and our assessment is that this objective was achieved.

Infantry Exercise (Botswana)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) which countries had armed forces involved in the infantry exercise in Botswana carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72787]

(2) what assessment he has made of the infantry exercise in Botswana carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72785]

(3) what assessment he has made of the benefits of the infantry exercise in Botswana carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72786]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Exercise DIAMOND CUTTER, which took place in Botswana from 4 February to 20 March 1998, involved B Company 2 PARA and a Company of the Botswana Defence Force. This exercise was designed to enable these personnel to gain extensive and realistic training experience by practising their skills and conducting advanced arms training in a demanding environment, over extended lines of communication, and our assessment is that these objectives were achieved.

Airborne Exercise (Ukraine)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel were deployed on the airborne exercise in Ukraine carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72924]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The airborne exercise COSSACK STEPPE, involving troops from the UK, Poland and Ukraine, took place in Ukraine in September 1997. The UK contribution was a company (approximately 130 personnel) from the 2nd Battalion, the Parachute Regiment.

Exercises (USA)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he had made of the principle benefits of the two infantry exercises in the USA carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72926]

Mr. Doug Henderson: These exercises were designed to enable the units involved to gain extensive and realistic training experience by practising their skills and conducting advanced arms training in a demanding environment, and our assessment is that these objectives were achieved.

Defence Analytical Services Agency

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are currently employed by the Defence Analytical Services Agency; and what was the figure at its inception. [72819]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 25 February 1999]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Analytical Services Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Paul Altobell to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 8 March 1999:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State on the number of people employed by the Defence Analytical Services Agency. As Chief Executive this falls within my area of responsibility.

The Defence Analytical Services Agency employed 148 permanent staff, (142 full time equivalents), plus 4 students on 1 April 1992. The Agency was launched on 1 July 1992. Precise figures are not available for that date but were not materially different from the 1 April position. On 1 January 1999 the Agency employed 112 permanent staff, (109 full time equivalents), plus 13 students.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Female Pilots

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many female pilots are currently serving in the (a) RAF and (b) Royal Navy; and how many are in training. [73789]

Mr. Doug Henderson: As at 1 January 1999, there were 25 trained female pilots serving in the RAF, with 21 under training. In the Naval Service, at the same date, there was one trained female pilot, with two under training.

Mr. Tony Geraghty

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the charges against Mr. Tony Geraghty. [74313]

Mr. Doug Henderson: There are at present no charges outstanding against Mr. Tony Geraghty.

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department has spent on missiles procured from the USA in the last 10 years, expressed in dollars. [74013]

Mr. Spellar: Expenditure at outturn prices on the procurement of missiles from the USA for the period 1 April 1988 to 31 March 1998 is as follows:

	$ million
Advanced Medium Range Air to Air Missile	98.0
Harpoon	70.7
Sidewinder	30.3
Tomahawk	24.8

CR Gas

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what guidelines his Department has drawn up for the use of CR gas. [74255]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The use of CR gas by the Armed Forces is governed by prescribed rules of engagement, and the service personnel concerned are fully trained in how to use it. Both the rules of engagement and the training are operationally sensitive and I am withholding details in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mark II Vehicles

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the (a) mechanical problems with and (b) alterations made to truck cargo heavy duty mark II vehicles since 9 March 1998; [74254]

(2) how many unscheduled stops there have been involving truck cargo heavy duty mark II vehicles since 9 March 1998; and if he will list the (a) dates, (b) location, (c) length of delay and (d) circumstances of each stop. [74253]

Mr. Spellar: Since 9 March 1998, there have been 8 minor mechanical defects with Truck Cargo Heavy Duty, TCHD, Mk 2 vehicles, details of these are as follows:

TCHD MK2—Unscheduled stops since 9 March 1998

	25 March 1998	27 March 1998

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the benefits of the jungle training exercise in Singapore carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72843]

(2) what his assessment is of the value of the jungle training exercise in Singapore carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72981]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 2 March 1999]: This exercise, involving a company of Royal Marines, was intended to maintain and develop their capability to conduct operations in a jungle environment, and is assessed to have succeeded in its aim.

Submarines (Health)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the health effects of service on a submarine. [74950]

Mr. Spellar: The Royal Navy has a comprehensive strategy to monitor for the health effects of submarine service. It is based on a programme of selective and rigorous medical screening and regular occupational health surveillance of individual submariners including monitoring for radiation exposure. This is backed up by epidemiological studies performed by independent authorities and a comprehensive system of scientific evaluation conducted in collaboration with other nations operating submarines.

As my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces announced in his written answer on 24 February 1999, Official Report, columns 300–01, medical studies have shown that some contaminants, which are present in the atmosphere of a submarine, exceed the levels which are considered safe for the foetus of a pregnant women. These contaminants pose no risk to adults.

The results of an independent mortality study undertaken for the Royal Navy by the Medical Research Council and published in the Occupational and Environmental Medicine Journal in 1997 concluded that submariners are an occupational health group with an overall lower rate of mortality among workers than in the general population.

Departmental Land

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current acreage of his Department's land holding; and what plans he has to reduce it. [74817]

Mr. Spellar: The total acreage of land that is held by the Ministry of Defence (both freehold and leasehold) stands at almost 593,000 acres (240,000 hectares). My Department recognises its responsibility to use and manage its estate effectively and our policy is to ensure that no more land is used than is needed to meet operational requirements.

There are currently some 32,000 acres (13,000 hectares) of surplus property scheduled for disposal, while the Strategic Defence Review set an ambitious target of £700 million in disposal receipts over four years. The Review also concluded that there should be more effective central strategic management of the estate. The Defence Estate Organisation and others are striving to ensure that the necessary processes are put in place to achieve this and we fully anticipate that further estate rationalisation will occur as a result.

Veterans' Advice Unit

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current budget of, and how many civil servants and military personnel are employed in, the Veterans' Advice Unit. [74659]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The Ministry of Defence Veterans' Advice Unit is currently staffed by three serving Warrant Officers (1 Royal Navy, 1 Army and 1 Royal Air Force).

The budget for the Veterans' Advice Unit covers the employment costs of the Warrant Officers, telecommunications and publicity material. The cost of the unit in the current financial year is estimated to be £89,000.

Chief of Defence Procurement

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the planned budget and total staff of the Chief of Defence Procurement after 1 April 2000. [74653]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 4 March 1999]: Detailed budgetary allocations to individual budget holders in the Ministry of Defence are made only one year in advance. In broad terms, however, our plans for the Chief of Defence Procurement's area of responsibility for the financial year 2000–01 envisage expenditure in the order of £5.5 billion on equipment and some £600 million in operating costs at 1998–99 constant prices. Staff numbers for that year are expected to be around 5,000.

Unified Defence Logistics Organisation

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the key milestones and timetable for the implementation of the unified Defence Logistics Organisation. [74649]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The Chief of Defence Logistics will assume full budgetary and management responsibility for the Defence Logistics Organisation from 1 April 1999 and will create a unified organisation from 1 April 2000.

DERA

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce the extent and nature of the public/private partnership for DERA. [74640]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 4 March 1999]: Initial advice from a team studying the options on the future of DERA is expected at the end of this month. Following a period of discussion and consultation, we would hope to make a decision and an announcement about the future of DERA later this year.

Defence Company Mergers

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for his Department's tendering policy of proposed United Kingdom defence company mergers. [74644]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The implications for MOD procurement policies and practice of any merger activity within the United Kingdom defence sector is assessed by the MOD on a case by case basis and in accordance with the regulatory process.

Nuclear Weapons Tests

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the basis of the methodologies used by (a) his Department and (b) consultants contracted by his Department to assess the effects of radiation exposure from atmospheric nuclear weapons tests upon servicemen and medical auxiliaries; what assessment he has made of their sensitivity to the available data; and what representation he has received in respect of them. [74960]

Mr. Spellar: Radiation exposure of servicemen who participated in the UK's atmospheric nuclear tests was subject to pre-set standards which were directly based upon the contemporary guidance issued by the International Commission for Radiation Protection. There were two basic regimes. First, those who were known to be at risk were issued with personal dosimeters (film badges) and, if necessary, protective clothing. Secondly, and for the majority, the protective arrangement was to ensure that all personnel were accounted for and located at safe distances from the detonations. Additionally, there were programmes of general environmental monitoring covering the range and domestic areas including the muster locations. Of the 22,000 veterans included in the studies, some 5,000 were issued with film badges. Only 1,716 of these had non-zero recorded radiation doses; of these only 483 received total doses of more than 5 mSv and only 80 received more than 50 mSv. These figures and the results of the environmental monitoring are strong evidence that the majority of test veterans had no radiation exposure as a result of their participation.

The health of the test veteran population has been the subject of two epidemiological studies carried out by the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB). The reports were published in 1988 and 1993. These studies made statistically based comparisons of the mortality and cancer experiences of the test veterans, regardless of the cause of the illness, with levels seen in both a matched control group and in the general population. The studies concluded that participation in the tests programme had not had a detectable effect on the participants' expectation of life or on their total risk of developing cancer.

Further and more detailed information about the methodologies used is given in the study reports copies of which are in the Library of the House. As regards representation, the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association (BNTVA) and their supporters have made clear their views on many occasions in recent years. However, the reports of these studies were peer reviewed, published in the scientific press and have not attracted any serious scientific criticism. The statistical sensitivity of the results is fully addressed in the reports.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many cases involving soldiers sentenced by non-military courts to terms of imprisonment have been disposed of under the provisions of section 70 of the Army Act 1955 for each year between 1988 and 1998 indicating (a) the court which dealt with the offence, (b) the nature of the offence, (c) the sentence and (d) whether the convicted person was discharged from the Army. [74428]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 5 March 1999]: No Army personnel have been convicted by civil courts under Section 70 of the Army Act 1955, as this provides for soldiers to be dealt with by military court-martial or summary dealing only. A number of soldiers have, however, been convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment by the civil courts but detailed information relating to such cases is not held centrally and could only be provided at a disproportionate cost. Section 134(1) of the Army Act prohibits a soldier from being tried by a court-martial or dealt summarily by his Commanding Officer for an offence, or substantially the same offence, of which he has been convicted in a civil court.

Territorial Army

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of (a) recruits enlisted into and (b) military personnel leaving the Territorial Army in each year since 1995–96. [74858]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The information is not held in the form requested; however the number of personnel, soldiers and officers, entering and leaving the Territorial Army, including to and from Regular Army, in each year since 1995–96 is as follows:

Inflow and outflow of TA Officers

	Intake	Outflow
1995–96	554	682
1996–97	613	719
1997–98	779	739

Inflow and outflow of TA soldiers

	Inflow	Outflow
1995–96	12,520	14,973
1996–97	13,380	14,291
1997–98	11,015	11,709

Notes:
1. Figures exclude Non Regular Permanent Staff.
2. Soldier Officer Inflows and Soldier Outflows include soldiers who have been promoted to TA officers.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements he has made to ensure that voluntary groups that use Territorial Army centres will not be adversely affected as a consequence of his TA review. [74862]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 5 March 1999]: At present, it is generally the case that voluntary groups rent space in TA centres on a commercial basis. We will ensure that voluntary groups, who make use of TA centres that are affected by the reforms, are given adequate notice to enable them to make alternative arrangements where necessary.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements he has made for TA personnel who are studying for qualifications at TA centres which are closing to continue their studies. [74859]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Where a unit or TA Centre is to close, we are making arrangements to transfer those TA personnel who are willing and able to an alternative unit where they may be able to continue their studies if required by the role of their new unit.

US Visiting Forces

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the UK bases which have needed clean-up operations after US visiting forces have vacated them, indicating the nature of the pollution, the costs, and who paid for these costs in each case. [75117]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the existing arrangements, agreements and memoranda of understanding between UK and US Governments in respect of the US visiting forces at Menwith Hill. [75114]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The presence of the US Visiting Forces at RAF Menwith Hill is governed by the NATO Status of Forces Agreement 1951 and other arrangements appropriate to the relationship which exists between the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States for the purposes of our common defence.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the Cost Sharing Agreement 1973 between the UK and US Governments in respect of the US visiting forces. [75115]

Mr. Doug Henderson: No. The 1973 Cost Sharing Arrangement is a confidential arrangement between the UK and US Governments and is being withheld under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the cost-sharing arrangements agreed between the US and UK Governments in respect of the US visiting forces. [75113]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The 1973 Cost Sharing Arrangement is the principal covering general costs sharing matters in relation to the presence of the United States Visiting Forces in the UK. A number of other arrangements exist which may contain cost sharing provisions but a record of these is not held centrally.

Challenger 2

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to place an order for Challenger Tank 2 training rounds; what is the anticipated value of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [74759]

Mr. Spellar: An Invitation to Tender was issued in August 1998 for a new training round to replace the Discarding Sabot/Tracer round. As the order is currently the subject of a competition, its value is commercially confidential between the bidders and the Ministry of Defence. It is hoped to award a contract later in the year and I will make a statement at that time.

Army Trucks

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Land Rover TUL/TUM (HS), the Wolf, was brought into service with the Army; and how many are now in use. [75294]

Mr. Spellar: The current Trucks Utility Light, TUL, and Trucks Utility Medium (High Specification), TUM(HS), the Land Rover Wolf, were brought into service with the Army in April 1997. A total of 6,352 vehicles have been issued to units to date, including 152 ambulance variants. There are 1,323 vehicles awaiting issue, including 623 ambulance variants, making a total of 7,675 vehicles.

Ministry of Defence Guard Service

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if members of the Ministry of Defence Guard Service carry arms. [74796]

Mr. Doug Henderson: No.

Military Road Traffic Accidents

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many road traffic accidents were reported involving the Land Rover TUL/TUM (HS), the WOLF, between April 1997 and March 1998; what were the (i) fatalities, (ii) serious injuries and (iii) slight injuries; and what were the estimated repair costs. [75007]

Mr. Spellar: 311 road traffic accidents were reported involving the Land Rover TUL/TUM/(HS) the WOLF, between April 1997 and March 1998. These accidents resulted in one fatality and 52 injuries of all types. The estimated repair cost is £294k.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many military road traffic accidents resulted in (a) fatalities, (b) serious injuries and (c) slight injuries between April 1997 and March 1998. [75005]

Mr. Spellar: Between April 1997 and March 1998 there were a total of 9,075 road traffic accidents involving military personnel and MOD civilians. These resulted in 64 fatalities (17 on duty and 47 off duty), 63 serious injuries and 862 slight injuries.

WALES

Autism

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many autism specific places are provided in Wales within (a) residential provision, (b) mainstream services, (c) specialist autism spectrum disorder services, (d) pre school services and (e) higher education. [73749]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information on services for the disabled, which is collected centrally, does not include information on the number of autism-specific places provided by local and health authorities for residential provision, mainstream services and specialist autism spectrum disorder services.

For pre-school services and higher education, information on autism-specific places is not collected centrally. However, the latest information available (at January 1998) shows that 475 pupils attending schools in Wales had statements of special educational needs specifying autism spectrum disorders. A breakdown by category of school is given.

Type of school	No. of pupils in Wales with statements specifying autism spectrum disorders
Maintained Nursery Schools	2
Maintained Primary Schools	168
Maintained Secondary Schools	41
Maintained Special Schools	252
Independent Schools (including independent special schools)	12
Total	475

Following the transfer of functions, these issues will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Schools (Repair and Maintenance)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the amount of repair and maintenance work waiting to be done in Welsh schools; and if he will make a statement. [74902]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The information requested is not held centrally.

I am fully aware of concerns expressed about the poor condition of many school buildings in Wales caused by under funding in previous years. We have moved quickly to assist local authorities by providing an additional £65 million over the lifetime of this Parliament for capital investment in schools; and we are maintaining, in cash terms, the normal capital allocations to local authorities for education for 1999–2000 at £43.939 million. Our plans provide nearly £200 million for capital expenditure in schools in Wales over the next three years.

Following the transfer of functions, this will become a matter for the National Assembly.

Social Services

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to publish a White Paper on Social Services in Wales similar to Modernising Social Services (Cm 4169), published in England in November 1998. [74792]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: We hope to do so shortly.

Food Strategy for Wales

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the progress of the three industry-led food working groups which he has established under the Food Strategy for Wales. [75712]

Mr. Michael: The three industry-led Working Groups, set up by my Department and supported by the Welsh Development Agency, have completed their Action Plans for the Lamb and Beef, Dairy and Organic Food Sectors, which we are publishing today, 8 March. I welcome this important contribution by the industry to helping farmers secure the future of their industry and to developing the Food Strategy for Wales. I am grateful to the Chairmen and members of the Groups for their work in preparing the Plans. I have placed copies of the three Action Plans and the Executive Summary in the Libraries of the House.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Minimum Pension Guarantee

15. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of pensioners in the Warrington, North constituency who will benefit from the minimum pension guarantee. [73052]

Mr. Timms: We estimate around 5,000 pensioners will benefit from the minimum income guarantee in the Warrington local authority district, when it is introduced in April.

Housing Benefit

16. Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to minimise fraud in the administration of housing benefit. [73053]

33. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the progress being made to combat housing benefit fraud. [73070]

Mr. Timms: We are committed to making all benefits secure against fraud and error. We will do this by getting payments right from the outset and by keeping them right for as long as the benefit is payable. For those cases which do go wrong, we will put them right promptly.

We have made substantial progress in applying this approach to Housing Benefit. For example, we have made an extra £100 million available over the next three years for the Verification Framework. This will enable all councils to check Housing Benefit claims more thoroughly.

31. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on his future plans for housing benefit. [73068]

Angela Eagle: We are taking forward a wide-ranging review of housing benefit in consultation with local authorities and other interested parties. The aim of the review is to simplify and improve both the benefit itself and the way in which it is delivered. In the meantime, we have in place several measures to drive forward better delivery of housing benefit including the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate's programme of visits to local authorities, improved communications between the Benefits Agency and local authorities through the use of IT, and extra funding and support for local authorities to operate the verification framework.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what conclusions he has reached from his consideration of the case of Stephen Gilhooly of Bathgate in relation to the withdrawal of housing benefit under new regulations relating to attendance on courses for over 25 year olds at technical institutions. [73150]

Angela Eagle: There are no new regulations withdrawing Housing Benefit from over 25 year olds at technical institutions. Most full-time students are excluded from entitlement to Housing Benefit, although certain students in vulnerable groups, such as lone parents, can continue to claim this benefit.

We are fully committed to helping unemployed people obtain the skills they need to improve their employability and, last June, introduced the New Deal for people aged over 25 to help the long-term unemployed undertake full-time education and training.

Widow's Pension

18. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if, following the implementation of his reform proposals, widows aged between 45 and 60 years who were widowed before 45 years of age and who are not currently receiving a widow's pension, can continue to choose to claim (a) retirement pension or (b) widow's pension on reaching 60 years of age. [73055]

Mr. Timms: Current widows who are entitled to Widow's Pension can choose to continue receiving it up to age 65. A woman who was widowed before age 45 may qualify for a Widow's Pension when her Widowed Mother's Allowance ceased or because she was widowed before April 1988.

These widows will continue to be able to receive Widow's Pension up to age 65 if they satisfy the qualifying conditions following implementation of our reforms.

Pension Reform

19. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on progress with pension reform. [73056]

Mr. Timms: We are currently consulting on our plans for radical reform of the pensions system that we set out in the Green Paper "Partnership in Pensions". The framework for stakeholder pension schemes laid out in the Green Paper is being taken forward in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill.

Welfare Reform

20. Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about his recent proposals for welfare reform. [73057]

Mr. Darling: We have received numerous representations on our recent proposals for reform, towards our central aim of work for those who can security for those who cannot.

Stakeholder Pensions

21. Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to introduce (a) incentives and (b) negative disincentives to the self-employed to take out stakeholder pension contracts. [73058]

Mr. Timms: There are no such plans. Our proposals for stakeholder pension schemes were laid out in the Green Paper.

The self-employed will be able to join stakeholder pension schemes. We expect that many of them will benefit from the improved security, flexibility and value for money offered by such schemes.

Pensions Green Paper

22. Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the responses so far to the Pensions Green Paper. [73059]

Mr. Timms: Our Pensions Green Paper is continuing to attract a great deal of interest. We have already received more than 100 written responses, and expect to receive many more by the closing date on 31 March.

Pensions

23. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much he expects the real spending powers of those dependent on the basic state old age pension to vary from that of those in employment in 1999–2000. [73060]

Mr. Darling: No one is expected to rely on the basic pension as their sole source of income. Short-term projections of the growth in pensioners' incomes are not available.

26. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the cost of administration of (a) the current state pension and (b) the secondary pension proposed in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill. [73063]

Mr. Timms: The administration costs charged to the National Insurance Fund for awarding and paying state retirement pension and collecting and maintaining records of National Insurance contributions were some £622 million in 1996–97[1]. This represents about 1.5 per cent. of the Fund's income in that year[1].

The Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill contains provisions to enable the setting up of flexible, secure, value for money stakeholder pension schemes. Administration costs should be low; both because of the ways schemes will be set up and run, and because we propose to set a minimum standard for the charges that can be made.

27. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the difficulties faced by those on low and modest incomes in making adequate provision for retirement. [73064]

Mr. Timms: The government recognise the difficulties faced by those on low and modest incomes. That is why we are guaranteeing a decent income in retirement for all pensioners through the Minimum Income Guarantee. We plan to replace SERPS with a new State Second Pension to ensure that everyone with a lifetime of work behind them will build up rights to a pension which will take them above a Minimum Income Guarantee; and the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill contains provisions to enable the setting up of flexible, secure value for money stakeholder pension schemes which will be particularly suitable for people on modest incomes.

28. Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to improve the pensions of long-term disabled people. [73065]

Mr. Timms: I refer my hon. Friend to the Written Answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) on 8 February 1999, Official Report, column 65.

39. Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how he proposes to ensure better security in retirement for the poorest households. [73076]

Angela Eagle: The measures proposed in the Green Paper, A new contract for welfare: Partnership in Pensions are intended to ensure that people who have worked throughout their working life on a low income will still be able to retire on an income above the level of the Minimum Income Guarantee. For the poorest households, the Minimum Income Guarantee will provide a secure income, which we intend over time and as resources allow, to increase in line with average earnings so that all pensioners, including the poorest, can share in the rising prosperity of the nation.

Benefit Claimants

24. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the upper limit permitted to benefit claimants for time spent writing material for publication before their benefit is reduced; and if he will make a statement. [73061]

Angela Eagle: The impact of time spent writing material for publication on entitlement to benefit depends on the claimant's circumstances and the benefit being claimed. For example, provided other conditions are satisfied Jobseeker's Allowance can be paid where work done for payment or in expectation is undertaken for less than 16 hours per week. Special rules apply to people on New Deal programmes.

Social Security Budget

25. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the proportion of Government expenditure the social security budget will comprise in 1999–2000; and what it was in 1996–97. [73062]

Mr. Darling: Social Security expenditure accounted for 29.3 per cent. of public expenditure in 1996–97 and it is estimated to be around 28.2 per cent. in 1999–2000.

Fraud

29. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received on levels of fraud within the benefit system; and if he will make a statement. [73066]

Mr. Timms: Consultation on the Green Paper, "Beating Fraud is Everyone's Business: securing the future", ended on 30 September 1998, and 165 responses were received. The great majority of responses supported the strategy and its governing principles.

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate is taking to deal with organised fraud in housing benefit; what action is proposed following the closure of the London organised fraud investigation team; and if he will make a statement. [74281]

Mr. Timms: The Benefit Fraud Inspectorate (BFI) was launched in November 1997 to examine and report to the Secretary of State on the administration of Social Security benefits by central Government agencies and local authorities with a particular emphasis on standards of counter-fraud and security performance. It examines and reports on local authority performance in administering Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit and countering fraud.

Local authorities in London now refer cases of suspected organised Housing Benefit fraud to Benefits Agency organised fraud investigation teams.

We are carrying out a review of how organised fraud within Social Security benefits, including fraud in those benefits that are administered by local authorities, can be countered.

Child Support Agency

30. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made in the reform of the Child Support Agency. [73067]

Angela Eagle: We are currently considering responses to the Green Paper "Children First: a new approach to child support" and will bring forward our final proposals for reform in due course.

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to tackle the difficulties experienced by the Child Support Agency in assessing child maintenance due from self-employed parents. [75820]

Angela Eagle: Draft child support regulations have today been placed in both Houses. These will, from October 1999, allow self-employed parents to provide the figures, which they use for self assessment of their earnings for tax purposes, for use in calculating child maintenance. These provisions together with measures in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill currently before the House which will enable Inland Revenue to provide earnings information for the self-employed where the parent fails to supply the information to the Child Support Agency, and other operational improvements being introduced by the Agency, will lead to a simpler and more effective basis for getting maintenance flowing. The draft regulations also contain provisions to extend the suspension of fees for the Agency's assessment and collection services until April 2001.

British Pensioners Overseas

32. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what step he is taking to ensure that British pensioners living overseas receive up-rated pensions to which they are entitled. [73069]

Mr. Timms: Over 380,000 British pensioners living overseas in around 30 countries are paid the up-rated UK State Pensions to which they are entitled. These are paid under European Community regulations, and certain long standing social security agreements which allow for the payment of upratings.

Unclaimed Benefits

34. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the total amount of benefits administered by his Department unclaimed by those entitled to them; and what measures he proposes to encourage take-up. [73071]

Angela Eagle: Information relating to the total amount of unclaimed Social Security benefit is not available, because for most benefits, these data are not routinely collected. Estimates of take-up of income-related benefits published for the year 1993–94 (covering Income Support, Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit and Family Credit) indicate that the total amount unclaimed was in the region of £2.5 billion. More recent data are currently being reviewed following an error discovered in the data relating to take-up among pensioners, which suggests that the level of take-up is likely to be somewhat higher than previously thought.

Recent initiatives to encourage take-up include a major publicity campaign to promote in-work benefits which was launched on 1 June last year. This campaign comprised TV and radio advertisements and a direct mailshot to lone parents. A special help line was established to handle telephone enquiries arising from the campaign.

We are also planning measures to encourage take-up of the Minimum Income Guarantee by pensioners. These measures will build on the findings from research into the reasons why pensioners do not take up their Income Support entitlement, and the nine pilot projects which the Department undertook last year to test different methods of encouraging pensioners to claim. We expect to publish the results of the research and the pilots later this year.

Child Poverty

35. Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to tackle the problem of child poverty. [73072]

Angela Eagle: Since November last year an extra £2.50 a week has been made available to less well off families with children under age 11, through the income-related benefits. From April this year we will implement the largest ever increase in Child Benefit, an extra £2.95 a week for the first or eldest child. A similar increase in the family premium will ensure that those on income-related benefits also gain.

We consider that helping parents to work is the best form of assistance. The New Deal for Lone Parents and National Childcare Strategy will together make it possible for more parents to start work or increase their hours. Around two million children will be better off as a result of the introduction of the Working Families Tax Credit and Childcare Tax Credit and, along with the National Minimum Wage, will help to ensure that work pays for more families with children.

Millennium Compliance

36. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on progress with the millennium compliance of computer systems involved in the provision of benefits. [73073]

Angela Eagle: All the computer systems used to assess and pay benefits were made compliant during 1998 (the majority before the end of August 1998). In addition, by the end of last year, we had successfully tested all these systems using dates before and after the Year 2000.

Disabled People

37. Mrs. Humble: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action his Department is taking to help disabled people into employment. [73074]

Mr. Bayley: Together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment we have introduced the New Deal for Disabled People to help disabled people and those with long term illness move into, or remain in, work: piloting a voluntary personal adviser service in 12 areas throughout Great Britain, for claimants of incapacity benefits; and funding a number of innovative schemes to test different approaches. From June we will also be piloting the Single Work Focused Gateway in twelve areas. In these areas, where appropriate, people of working age who claim benefits will be given a Personal Adviser who will be able to access information and the opportunities for employment, training and rehabilitation, and will help them plan a route back to independence.

In October 1998 we introduced a new 52 week linking rule for incapacity benefits and abolished the 16 hour limit for voluntary work. We have increased the therapeutic earnings limit from April 1999 and plan to pilot further changes to benefits from April. In addition the disabled persons tax credit, will be more generous than the Disability Working Allowance it will replace. We will also reform the All Work Test so that, as well as establishing the level of incapacity for benefit purposes, it will also provide information which will be potentially helpful to disabled people and their personal advisers when planning a return to work. The Department for Education and Employment has an extensive range of measures aimed at helping disabled people into employment.

Second-tier Pensions

38. Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to encourage the spread of second-tier pensions. [73075]

Mr. Timms: The proposals in the pensions Green Paper for introducing stakeholder pension schemes, strengthening occupational pension schemes and providing a new State Second Pension will all encourage second-tier pension provision.

Legislation to provide for stakeholder pension schemes forms part of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill introduced last month.

Single Gateway

40. Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to pilot the Single Gateway to Benefits for people of working age. [73077]

Angela Eagle: The pilots for the Single Work-Focused Gateway will commence from June 1999.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the total refurbishment bill for properties used by his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) related public bodies, for (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98, (iii) 1998–99 and (iv) 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [69201]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 8 February 1999]: The information set out relates to properties used by The Scottish Office and its Associated Departments and Agencies with the exception of the Scottish Prison Service for which figures could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The total refurbishment cost for the years requested are:

Refurbishment

	Department	Agencies
1996–97	55,896	13,652,426
1997–98	56,323	7,219,740
1999–2000	9,600,000	9,526,520

The refurbishment work has been carried out on a range of buildings, offices and specialist facilities and has been necessary either to preserve the fabric of the buildings or to bring systems up to a modern standard. Increased expenditure by The Scottish Office mainly relates to refurbishment of St. Andrew's House, and the buildings associated with the interim Parliament accommodation. The greater part of the expenditure under Agencies relates to the refurbishment of court buildings.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the properties of his Department, agencies and public bodies which are currently vacant; how long he expects each to be vacant for; and what is the estimated annual cost of maintaining the properties in a vacant state. [69200]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 8 February 1999]: The information set out relates to vacant properties which are owned by The Scottish Office and its Associated Departments and Agencies.

Information about vacant properties owned by other public bodies is not held centrally.

Schizophrenia

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Scotland in the last year; and how many were admitted for a hospital stay more than once during the year. [74388]

Mr. Galbraith: 3,761 patients with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Scotland during the year ending 31 March 1996, of which 675 were admitted more than once.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people discharged from mental illness hospitals in Scotland in the last year after a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses, having been proved vulnerable homeless subsequently became voluntary homeless. [74274]

Mr. Galbraith: The information requested is not collected or held centrally.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds in Scotland have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses; and what these occupied beds represent as a percentage of (a) mental and (b) all beds in Scotland. [74270]

Mr. Galbraith: There were 1,751 patients with a main diagnosis of schizophrenic psychoses in mental illness hospitals and psychiatric units in Scotland at 31 March 1996, the latest year for which complete information is available. This represented 17.2 per cent. of the average available staffed mental illness beds, and 4.2 per cent. of all average available beds in Scotland for the quarter ending 31 March 1996.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

CS Sprays

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which police forces in Scotland (a) have and (b) have not equipped their officers with CS sprays since August 1996; for what reasons they were issued; and how many police officers in Scotland currently carry CS sprays. [74199]

Mr. McLeish: CS incapacitant spray is not in general use by the police service in Scotland. The Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) conducted a trial into the effectiveness of CS incapacitant spray as an item of police defence equipment during the period 1 October 1997 to 30 September 1998. The trial areas encompassed the City of Dundee in the Tayside Police area and a Division in the Strathclyde Police area. In total, 803 officers were trained to use the equipment in these pilot areas. An evaluation of the trial has been completed but ACPOS have deferred a decision on extending the use of the spray pending an independent assessment on the safety of the spray commissioned by the Department of Health. The spray continues to be used by officers in the 2 trial areas.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Road Maintenance

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to improve road maintenance in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [74404]

Mr. Macdonald: Maintenance of local roads is the responsibility of local authorities and details of their plans are not held centrally. Funding for road maintenance on the motorway and trunk road network in Scotland was increased following the recent Comprehensive Spending Review. This will enable us to tackle the backlog of maintenance and repair and ensure that our road network is maintained in a stable condition.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

M74

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce a decision on the proposed completion of the M74 from Tollcross to Kingston Bridge; and if he will make a statement. [74408]

Mr. Macdonald: The City of Glasgow and South Lanarkshire Councils agreed that the proposal to extend the M74 should be considered within the review assessing priorities for future trunk road investment in Scotland. The outcome of the review will be announced as soon as is practicable.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated cost of changing the name of the M74 motorway to the M6; and if he will make a statement. [74410]

Mr. Macdonald: No estimate of the cost of changing the name of the Glasgow to Carlisle motorway to the M6 has yet been prepared. Such an estimate would require a detailed survey of signs on the existing road and connecting roads. This would be undertaken only as a precursor to initiating the proposal.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Homelessness

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the estimated numbers of homeless people in each council area in Scotland. [74406]

Mr. Macdonald: The table gives information on the number of households in each council area in Scotland in 1996–97 who applied to the local authority for accommodation or assistance in obtaining accommodation and the local authority in question assessed the household as being homeless or threatened with homelessness. All figures are rounded to the nearest 10 and are based on those contained in The Scottish Office Statistical Bulletin HSG/1998/4 published in August 1998.

Demographic Statistics

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the numbers of (a) young people under the age of 16 years and (b) retired people living in each parliamentary constituency in Scotland. [74407]

Mr. McLeish: The information requested is given in the table. The population figures have been prepared by a method which involves a certain degree of approximation and therefore should be treated with some caution.

Criminal Offences (Young People)

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of people aged 15 to 25 years committed a criminal offence in each year since 1992. [74522]

Mr. McLeish: The available information is given in the table. It relates to the number of individuals who were convicted in Scottish courts at least once in a given year for conduct classified as a crime or for breach of the peace or simple assault, which are classified as offences. It therefore excludes convictions for motor vehicle and some minor common law and statutory offences. In addition to cases dealt with in court, children in Scotland who are suspected of committing offences are generally referred to the Reporter to a children's hearing. Each year an average of around 4,500 children aged 15 and over are referred to Reporters on offence grounds, equivalent to 7 per cent. of the 15-year-old population.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of people aged 15 to 25 years have been convicted of (a) two, (b) three and (c) four offences. [74521]

Mr. McLeish: The available information is given in the table. It relates to the number of occasions between 1989 and 1997 on which people who were aged 15–25 years at June 1997 were convicted in Scottish courts for conduct classified as a crime, or for breach of the peace and simple assault, which are classified as offences. It therefore excludes convictions for motor vehicle and some minor common law and statutory offences.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Capercaillie (Protection)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what instruction he has given the Deer Commission concerning the use of deer fences within areas known to support the capercaillie; and what actions are proposed to remove existing fences where they are dangerous to black grouse and capercaillie; [72893]

(2) if he will add the capercaillie to Schedule 1 part II of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 in order to protect its lekking sites from deliberate disturbance. [72894]

Mr. Macdonald: The Deer Commission for Scotland has no powers either to erect or remove fences itself. However, the prevention of strikes on deer fencing by birds such as black grouse and capercaillie is always considered by the Deer Commission for Scotland when advice is given to woodland managers, including the Forestry Commission, on forest protection and deer control. Where new planing is considered under the Forestry Commission's Woodland Grant Scheme, wide consultation takes place to ensure that any fences which are considered necessary are sited to minimise negative effects. In some cases, fences are marked in areas known to be used by birds and removed as soon as the trees are established. The Forestry Commission is removing about 200 km of existing fencing on its own land, and is contributing towards the cost of removing over 100 km of deer fencing on private land.

My right hon. Friend has at present no plans to add the capercaillie to Schedule 1 part II of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Additional protection for the capercaillie, under the 1981 Act, is one of a number of issues currently under consideration by the Scottish Biodiversity Group's Capercaillie Species Action Plan Steering Group.

As from 1 July these will be matters for the Scottish Parliament.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 12 January 1999, Official Report, column 145, if he will list the expenditure incurred by (a) the Employment Service (b) his other agencies and non-departmental public bodies and (c) the Central Office of Information for relevant work carried out for his Department which is not included in the table. [67944]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 28 January 1999]: The figures for total expenditure are as follows:

Employment Service (excluding New Deal)

Public Opinion Research

May 1997 until December 1998—£110,435

Television, Radio and Newspaper Advertising

May 1997 until December 1998—£698,503.

Therefore the total spend on research and advertising for the period May 1997 until December 1998 was £808,938 or an average of £40,941 per month. There were no direct marketing costs.

This compares with a total spend of £2,843,282; (advertising £2,824,471; research £8,811), or an average of £236,940 per month, for the previous financial year 1996–97.

New Deal

Public Opinion Research

May 1997 until December 1998—£117,177

Television, Radio and Newspaper Advertising

May 1997 until December 1998—£7,862,867.

Therefore the total spend on research and advertising for the period May 1997 to December 1998 was £7,980,044 or an average of £399,002 per month. There were no direct marketing costs.

Since New Deal was not in existence before May 1997, comparisons cannot be made with 1996–97 expenditure.

Agencies and NDPBs

The expenditure on behalf of agencies and non-departmental public bodies was included in the reply given on 12 January 1999, Official Report, column 145.

COI

The expenditure incurred by the Central Office of Information is included as appropriate in the reply given on 12 January and in the above figures for the ES and New Deal.

Pre-school Learning

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will estimate the number of children who received pre-school learning in (a) 1997 and (b) 1998. [73347]

Ms Hodge: The full-time equivalent number of pupils under compulsory school age receiving pre-school education was 773,693 in Spring 1997 and 811,958 in Spring 1998.

The Government have ensured that a place is available from September 1998 for every four year old whose parents want one. In addition, the Government have set a target to double the national participation rate of three year olds in free early education places to 66 per cent. by 2002.

Mathematics

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what minimum qualifications in mathematics are required to teach mathematics in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools; and what were the required qualifications 10 years ago. [74021]

Ms Estelle Morris: The minimum requirement now, and also 10 years ago, for employment as a teacher in a maintained school is the holding of Qualified Teacher Status awarded by the Secretary of State after successful completion of an approved course of initial teacher training (ITT). Decisions about the suitability of a candidate to be employed to teach a particular subject or age range are a matter for the employer.

All entrants to ITT courses since 1979 have been required to have attained at least a grade C in GCSE mathematics or a recognised equivalent. All current trainees on primary ITT courses must follow the national curriculum for primary mathematics. From this September, secondary trainees specialising in mathematics must follow the national curriculum for secondary mathematics.

Our Green Paper on the modernisation of the teaching profession, published in December, made clear our determination to ensure that all new teachers have a thorough grounding in numeracy, literacy and information and communication technology. As a first step, we propose to pilot this summer a numeracy test which we intend all trainees would have to pass, from summer 2000, before they could be qualified as teachers.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money has been spent since 1 May 1997 on improvements to school buildings; and what proportion of this expenditure has been generated through public private partnerships. [74790]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The following tables show the annual capital expenditure on school building repair and improvement in England of 1997–98 and the estimated outturn for 1998–99.

The figures shown for Central Government allocations include capital grants to voluntary aided and special agreement schools, capital grants to non-maintained special schools and specialist schools and grants to grant maintained schools paid by The Funding Agency for Schools. In addition, these figures also include £84 million and £250 million in 1997–98 and 1998–99 respectively for New Deal for Schools and £90 million in 1998–99 for new capital support for schools—£35 million to remove outside toilets, £15 million to improve heating and £40 million to reduce Key Stage 1 class sizes.

The figures shown for the Local Authority expenditure include credit approvals, receipts and other Local Authority funds.

National Grid for Learning

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress in the development of a national grid for learning. [74775]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Plans for the National Grid for Learning and developing in accordance with achieving the targets announced in the National Grid for Learning Challenge 'Open for Learning, Open for Business', launched in November 1998 by my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister.

To date, £216 million has been allocated for schools' purchase of ICT networking and infrastructure. A further £450 million remains to be allocated over the years 2000–2002. This funding will enable all schools to be connected to the Grid by 2002, and will provide them with online access to a wide range of educational and managerial resources.

Student Grants

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received about the changes to the student maintenance grant scheme. [74778]

Mr. Mudie: We have received a number of recent representations on the new arrangements for student support in higher education. We invited representations from key interested bodies, including the National Union of Students, the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, and the Local Government Association, in consulting them on the detail of the proposed changes to the arrangements in 1999–2000. We have also, outside those consultations, received representations from other interested bodies and individuals. We carefully considered all of these when finalising the Education (Student Support) Regulations which came into force on 3 March this year.

University for Industry

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress of the new University for Industry. [74777]

Mr. Mudie: Considerable progress has been made towards the establishment of the University for Industry (Ufl). A three year Corporate Plan for the UFI's development and implementation was recently agreed by Ministers as the basis for future planning. The UFI organisation intends to publish a summary of its plans shortly. Dr. Anne Wright, UFI's Chief Executive, and Lord Dearing, the newly appointed Chairman, will drive forward the Ufl's development and implementation. The Ufl is on target to launch nationally in the year 2000.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much had been spent from public funds on market research about the University for Industry by 28 February. [75290]

Mr. Mudie: The total amount that has been spent from public funds on market research about the University for Industry by 28 February is £317,900.

A-levels and Vocational Courses

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Government's pilot schemes to (a) broaden A-levels and (b) upgrade vocational courses; and what plans he has to extend the pilot schemes nationwide. [74807]

Mr. Mudie: We expect to make an announcement shortly on the outcome of the consultation on taking forward the Government's commitment to support broader A levels and upgraded vocational qualifications, underpinned by rigorous standards and key skills. We have already made clear that the revised AS, A level and Advanced GNVQ—which are being developed in the light of a number of pilot schemes—will be introduced nationally for teaching from September 2000.

GCSE Examinations (Entry Fee)

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to allow individual schools to charge parents entry fees for GCSE examinations where students fail to attend for the examination. [74701]

Mr. Mudie: Under Section 453 of the Education Act 1996, maintained schools are already able to recover GCSE examination entry fees from parents where a student fails without good reason to attend an examination.

Further Education Lecturers

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to resolve the dispute between further education lecturers who continued to retain silver book conditions of service in further education colleges after incorporation in 1993 and their employers. [74698]

Mr. Mudie: It is for individual colleges to decide the conditions of service and what pay increases they will offer their staff, within the resources available to each college and within the framework of the Government's policy on public sector pay. Ministers, however, have consistently emphasised the importance of partnership between employers and staff in delivering the vital contribution of Further Education to our lifelong learning vision. We have been encouraging the national representative bodies to collaborate in the interests of that agenda, and we warmly welcome the announcement by National Association for Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE) and the Association of Colleges (AoC) of the end of their dispute.

European Funding

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which countries have sent him copies of their EU Objective 3 Social Fund application forms; and if he will place translations of them in the Library. [74704]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have so far received copies of the current Objective 3 application forms from Denmark, Spain, Belgium, Finland, Sweden and Germany. These have already been placed in the Library and I will ensure translations in English are available there.

NVQ Standards

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of all those aged from 18 to 64 years, who are in employment or actively seeking employment, are qualified to NVQ (a) level 3 and (b) level 4 in (i) the United Kingdom and (ii) England; and what the figures were in each year from 1993. [75069]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The information requested is contained in the following table.

Proportion of economically active adults [1] qualified to at least

Year	NVQ level 3 or equivalent		NVQ level 4 or equivalent
	UK	England	UK	England

All-age Special Schools

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the (a) benefits and (b) disadvantages of all-age special schools; and if he will make a statement. [75490]

Mr. Charles Clarke: When deciding statutory proposals to alter or establish special schools, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, takes account of professional advice from Ofsted, which will address issues such as the number and age range of the proposed pupil population and the suitability of provision to meet their special educational needs.

Teachers (Pension Scheme)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to receive the Working Group's report on the long-term examination of the teachers' pension scheme. [75073]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have received the Working Group's report and am currently considering its findings and recommendations.

Foreign Language Teaching

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what plans he has to end the statutory requirement for 14 to 16-year-old pupils to be taught a foreign language; [75410]

(2) if he will make a statement on the requirement for compulsory foreign language study as part of the national curriculum. [75411]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have no plans to end the statutory requirement for 14 to 16-year-olds to be taught a modern foreign language. We recognise the importance of foreign language learning and are considering ways of strengthening its teaching in schools.

Education Spending (Cumbria)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) for what reasons his press notice LPN 41/99 is not available on the departmental internet; [75285]

(2) for what reason departmental press officers telephoned media outlets in Cumbria asking them not to use the press release of 24 February which they had just issued; [75286]

(3) what representations he has received from Cumbria county council since the issue of his press release on 24 February; [75287]

(4) what powers he has to compel Cumbria county council to spend on education the moneys he has allocated to it; [75288]

(5) what steps he will take (a) to monitor and (b) to enforce compliance with his request to Cumbria county council to spend their full standard spending assessment on education. [75289]

Ms Estelle Morris: The central Government grant that supports Standard Spending provision is unhypothecated. Nevertheless, we have examined local authority budget proposals in the public domain, for evidence that they have reflected the increased funding in their education budgets. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the Leader of Cumbria county council in February to urge them to consider their plans and use all of the increase to support education, and a press notice was drafted to that effect. I am pleased to say that, since then, we have been informed by the county council that they do intend to reflect their full education SSA increase of £9.4 million (5.0 per cent.) in their 1999–2000 education budget.

CABINET OFFICE

Polling Organisations

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will establish an appropriate body, with a remit equivalent to the Advisory Committee on Advertising, to check the competence and propriety of polling organisations bidding for Government work. [75209]

Mr. Kilfoyle: No. Decisions on awarding Government contracts to polling organisations are subject to the same strict requirements of value for money as any other category of Government procurement. In particular, the process of evaluating tenders includes an assessment of the competence of the tenderers to deliver the work required.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Mediation

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what funding he plans to make available for the Surrey Mediation Forum. [74682]

Mr. Hoon: None. It has not been the Government's policy to provide core funding to individual or local mediation organisations, although some support is provided in family mediation to national representative organisations for the development of the family mediation function.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to assist the development of a national mediation council. [74683]

Mr. Hoon: None, although some support has been provided in family mediation to national representative organisations for the development of the family mediation function.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to ensure common standards of practice between the private and legally aided mediation sectors. [74681]

Mr. Hoon: The Government are not aware that there are distinct private and legally aided mediation sectors. Individual family mediators, however, undertake both private and publicly funded work. The standards of practice required for publicly funded family mediation work are set out in the contracts individual family mediators have with the Legal Aid Board.

Woolf Reforms

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Woolf reforms on the conduct of litigation. [74684]

Mr. Hoon: The first phase of civil justice reforms will be introduced on 26 April. Those reforms represent a modernisation of the civil justice system, which is aimed at making it quicker, simpler and less costly to its users. Judicial case management will control the conduct of litigation, directing the work to be done in preparing a case for trial. This will ensure the time is in proportion to the complexity of that case and the issues at stake.

Civil Procedure Rules

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Lord Chancellor will designate one particular publication of the new civil procedure rules as the official version to be used by judges and practitioners in court. [R] [74765]

Mr. Hoon: The Department has no intention of designating one publication as the preferred version.

Conditional Fee Arrangements

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the current availability of (a) contingent and (b) after-the-event insurance to cover conditional fee arrangements. [R] [74764]

Mr. Hoon: The discussions I and my officials have had with the insurance industry have clearly shown us that the provision of legal expenses insurance, both before the event and after the event, is diverse and considerable. Insurance aimed specifically at conditional fee agreements is almost exclusively after-the-event insurance, and the principal providers of insurance to underpin conditional fee agreements are well known. There is an increasing interest for insurance to underpin conditional fee agreements for proceedings other than personal injury cases. There are several well-known products in relation to personal injury cases, including the product developed jointly with the Law Society. All the indications are that good cases have no difficulty in obtaining insurance and that the market is maturing with the experience of nearly three and half years of operation. My officials keep in regular contact with the industry.

Lord Chancellor

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the cost to the public purse of printing and sending out the letters from the Lord Chancellor to promote the application by Mr. Andrew Patrick to re-join the Garrick Club; and if the Lord Chancellor intends to repay the cost. [75155]

Mr. Hoon: The approximate costs were:

Postage	9.80
Stationery	7.84
Typing	6.98
Total	24.62

The Lord Chancellor has repaid these costs.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will estimate the man-hours used by the Lord Chancellor's Diary Secretary in pursuing replies to the invitation sent out by the Lord Chancellor in connection with the re-election of Mr. Andrew Patrick to the Garrick Club; and what was the cost incurred. [75154]

Mr. Hoon: None. Most of those written to have already replied. The Diary Secretary will not be pursuing the outstanding invitations.

HEALTH

Hospitals (Winter Pressures)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospitals in the North and South Thames Regions which have received winter pressures money this winter, indicating the amounts received. [65491]

Mr. Denham: Information on winter pressures allocations by health authority is shown in the table. The information on individual hospitals is not available centrally in the form requested.

NHS Staff (Pay)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of the proposed salary rises for NHS staff in England (a) in total and (b) broken down by category. [69992]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 February 1999]: Until the negotiations with non-Review Body staff groups have been completed it will not be possible to estimate the total cost of this year's pay awards. Estimates for the costs of the Review Body awards are set out as follows:

	£ million
Nurses	370
Professions Allied to Medicine	60
Hospital and Community Health Service
Doctors and Dentists	120

Schizophrenia Patients

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were admitted for a hospital stay more than once during the last year in each health region in England. [73232]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the number of times patients have been admitted more than once during the year are not held centrally.

Diabetes (Prescriptions)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the average cost per week of prescriptions for sufferers from diabetes; [73317]

(2) for what reasons diabetes sufferers are eligible for free prescriptions. [73315]

Mr. Denham: In 1997 the net ingredient cost of drugs used in the treatment of diabetes and dispensed in the community in England was £142.6 million, an average of £2.7 million a week. The net ingredient cost is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or any prescription charge income.

Diabetes sufferers are eligible for free prescriptions, except where treatment is by diet alone, as diabetes was identified in 1968 as one of a number of readily identifiable, permanent, life long conditions requiring regular or extensive medication.

Speech Therapists (Cumbria)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of speech therapists required in Cumbria; and how many were in post at the latest available date. [73480]

Mr. Denham: North Cumbria Health Authority has agreed with local National Health Service trusts and Cumbria Education Authority that the number of speech and language therapists should be increased by four. Recruitment to these posts is currently underway.

22 whole-time equivalent staff classed as therapists working in the speech and language therapy area of work were in post in North Cumbria on 30 September 1997.

Health Services Accreditation

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to maintain the work and methodology of Health Services Accreditation for use by the NHS. [73894]

Mr. Denham: The health authorities which sponsor the work of Health Services Accreditation will be discussing with a range of interested parties including the National Health Service Executive how the work and methodologies of that body might be of use to the NHS in the future.

Dental Services

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of dental contract holders in each health authority area have had (a) an increase in the number of registrations and (b) a decrease in the number of registrations in the most recent year for which figures are available. [74262]

Mr. Denham: Information on the percentage of dental contract holders having a National Health Service list which increased or decreased between January 1998 and January 1999 (the latest date for which information is available) has been placed in the Library. The percentage increases and decreases may not add to 100 because some dentists will have an unchanged list size. The comparisons are for dentists with contracts open at both January 1998 and January 1999 and exclude dentists with no registrations on both dates. Dentists with contracts in several health authorities are counted in each health authority in which they have a contract but only once in the England total. The comparisons between January 1998 and January 1999 are affected by the reduction in the registration period to 15 months.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the average length of time taken to process grant applications under the Investing in Dentistry Scheme; [74260]

(2) Health what percentage of the Investing in Dentistry Scheme funding has been spent on (a) set up costs and (b) gross fees. [74261]

Mr. Denham: Each investing in dentistry funding request is dealt with as quickly as possible. The time taken to process a grant application depends on many factors, including the number of proposals received, the complexity of the request, and whether further information is required before a decision can be made.

To date, just over £7.5 million of investing in dentistry grants have been approved to enable over 600,000 patients to register with an National Health Service dentist, giving rise to treatment costs estimated to be around £2.5 million in 1998–99.

Tavistock Institute Research

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the NFM Tavistock Institute research project on mediation in public law and social services departments. [74680]

Mr. Hutton: In 1995 the Department funded a pilot project on child protection mediation. The report highlighted the advantages of effective dispute resolution as well as the difficulties of ensuring full inter-agency co-operation. The small number of cases involved suggest that further developmental work will be needed if advance dispute resolution is to make a major contribution in the handling of public law cases.

Fireworks

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many injuries resulting from accidents involving fireworks were reported in Great Britain for each year from 1990 to 1997, broken down by hospital casualty unit. [74635]

Dr. Howells: I have been asked to reply.

The DTI's annual census of fireworks injuries is conducted over a four week period taking in the run-up to 5 November and a few days afterwards. Details of injuries recorded at each NHS Trust are available only for the years 1996 and 1997. Information for the years 1992 to 1995 is recorded by regional and district health authorities but no information on a regional basis is recorded for 1991. Copies of the annual reports of firework injuries for each of these years were placed in the Library as soon as they were published. A breakdown of the injuries recorded by each A&E unit for the years 1992 to 1995 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

No reliable estimates of fireworks injuries outside the census period can be made because the numbers are too small to be extrapolated from data in the Home Accident Surveillance System.

Appointments

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by region the appointments he has made since his appointment; and if he will list the known political affiliations of appointees. [75027]

Mr. Denham: Information on the political activity of those appointed to National Health Service boards is contained in the Department of Health's Public Appointments Annual Report. This Report is currently being prepared for all those in post at 1 March 1999 and will be published in June. Copies of last year's report, giving details of all those appointed at 1 March 1998, are available in the Library.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the NHS trust and health authority appointments which were not made by the due date; and which remained outstanding on 1 March. [74833]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The information requested is shown in the table.

Human Vaccines (Bovine Material)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how those human vaccines which contained bovine material prohibited for use in the human food chain were disposed of when a ban was introduced on the use of those vaccines; [75095]

(2) on what date it was decided to discontinue use of human vaccines which contained bovine materials prohibited for use in the human food chain; [75094]

(3) if he will make a statement on the use prior to 1996 in human vaccines of bovine material prohibited for use in the food chain. [75096]

Ms Jowell: Vaccines licensed for use in the United Kingdom do not contain, in the finished product, bovine materials prohibited for use in the human food chain. However, bovine material is used in the early stage of manufacture of some vaccines which are subject to rigorously controlled purification processes.

In March 1989, the Committee of the Safety of Medicines issued guidelines regarding the controls on the sourcing of bovine material used in the manufacture of pharmaceuticals. These were superseded by 'Guidelines for Minimising the Risk of Transmitting Agents causing Spongiform Encephalopathies via Medicinal Products' from the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products in 1992. The guidelines have been updated to reflect developments in scientific knowledge and require animal-derived materials to be sourced from countries with no reported cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce legislation to amend section 4 of Children Act 1989 to provide for a duty to assist. [74726]

Mr. Hutton: As announced in the Response to the Children's Safeguards Review on 5 November 1998, the Government intend legislating to replace the current power to assist under Section 24 of the Children Act 1989 with a duty to assess and meet the needs of care leavers up to the age of 18 and will study the costs, limitations and affordability of extending this duty until the young person reaches the age of 21.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will assess the impact of Quality Protects plans on inter-departmental co-ordination between housing and social services departments; and if he will make a statement on the enforcement of existing rules under the Children Act 1989. [74723]

Mr. Hutton: The Quality Protects programme is directed at the local authority as a whole, including housing and social services departments, and is intended to promote corporate commitment to delivering improved services for children. Management Action Plans submitted to the Department by local authorities are currently being evaluated, and progress in implementation will be monitored by the Government. The Government have also stated in the White Paper "Modernising Social Services" their intention to place a duty on the local authority as a whole in planning children's services and for all parties to participate in and take responsibility for their delivery.

Post-care Provision

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure local authorities provide written guidance to persons leaving care. [74724]

Mr. Hutton: Every local authority should provide an easy to read guide to its services for young people when they leave care. The Government will address this subject in the guidance on leaving care they intend issuing later this year.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what (a) advice and (b) amenities are available to persons leaving care at 18 years; and if he will make a statement. [74725]

Mr. Hutton: Local authorities have duties and powers under the Children Act 1989 to advise, befriend and assist care leavers up to the age of 21. Extensive guidance on the exercise of these responsibilities was issued to accompany the Children Act but further guidance will be issued later this year, as announced in the Government's Response to the Children's Safeguards Review.

Quality Protects Action Plans

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the Quality Protects action plans submitted by local authorities; and if he will make a statement. [75299]

Mr. Hutton: All local authorities submitted their Quality Protects Management Action Plans by the closing date of 31 January 1999. These are currently being evaluated by the Department's Social Services Inspectorate. The Department will publish a national overview report of the Management Action Plans when these evaluations have been completed.

Foster Care

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, following the review of safeguards for children living away from home, he will ensure that children in all forms of foster care are protected from corporal punishment. [75156]

Mr. Hutton: Corporal punishment is not permitted by law, with the exception that a parent or someone acting in loco parentis is entitled to administer corporal punishment that is reasonable in all the circumstances. Legislation prohibits corporal punishment in children's homes, foster care and registered care homes.

Current legislation does not prevent the use of corporal punishment by private foster carers. Children Act guidance on assessing the suitability of private foster carers states that social workers should explore the (private) foster carers' views on discipline, including their preparedness to accept that corporal punishment is inappropriate for children who are privately fostered. A consultation document will be issued shortly on how the law can be improved in order to better protect children.

Medicines (Children)

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment the Government have made under the licensing process of the side-effects of medicines used on children; [75473]

(2) if he will assess the applicability for the United Kingdom of the system for licensing medicines for children in the United States, which will compel pharmaceutical companies to provide information about the effects of their drugs on children; [75474]

(3) what is the incidence of adverse reaction of children to (a) unlicensed and (b) off-label treatments. [75472]

Ms Jowell: There is no centrally held record of suspected adverse reactions to medicines and the incidence is not therefore known. However, the Yellow Card Scheme exists for health professionals to report suspected adverse reactions to the Medicines Control Agency and Committee on Safety of Medicines on a voluntary basis. This scheme has been successful in identifying new hazards to medicines so that prescribers may be informed about the safe use of medicines. In addition, a pilot scheme has been set up in the Trent Region, with funding from the Medicines Control Agency, to monitor the safety of medicines in children. This includes suspected adverse reaction reports associated with unlicensed and off-label usage of medicines in children.

When an application is made for a licence for a medicine for use in children, the evidence submitted in support of the quality, safety and efficacy of the medicine is evaluated. The side-effects occurring during the paediatric clinical trials are assessed as part of this evaluation. A final decision regarding the grant of a licence for use in children is made after weighing the potential benefits of the proposed treatment against the potential risks.

Currently in the United Kingdom the decision to undertake appropriate trials to support an application for a licence for use of a medicine in the treatment of children rests with pharmaceutical companies. A recently adopted European guideline encourages the pharmaceutical industry to undertake appropriate clinical trials on products with anticipated therapeutic benefits in children. However, if the guidance does not have the effect of increasing the availability of appropriate medicinal products for children, there is scope for the UK and other Member States to raise with the European Commission the question of whether legislation similar to that in operation in the United States should be introduced to strengthen the European regulatory framework.

Nurses (Training)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what perecentage of nurses' training takes place in hospital wards; and if he will make a statement. [75009]

Mr. Denham: Pre-registration nurse education programmes consist of a minimum of 4,600 hours theoretical and practical instruction of which no less than 50 per cent., or 2,300 hours, are spent in clinical placements dealing directly with patients. The large majority of placements will take place in hospital wards although community, primary care and other clinical settings are also used.

Residential and Nursing Care

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost to (a) nursing and (b) residential home owners of the implementation of the new national required standards for residential and nursing homes over the next five year period. [74565]

Mr. Hutton: We intend to publish the proposed standards for older people in residential care, produced by the Centre for Policy on Ageing, for consultation shortly. We will also consider the detailed cost implications for nursing home and residential care home owners of introducing the standards prior to taking any decision about their implementation.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision will be made in National Health Service funding 1999–2000 to independent providers of residential and nursing care to meet the cost of pay increases awarded to nurses and auxiliary nurses; and if he will make a statement. [73981]

Mr. Hutton: None. Independent providers of residential and nursing care homes are free to decide on the pay rates for their staff according to their particular requirements and circumstances.

TREASURY

Agenda 2000

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effect on the British rebate under the Fontainebleau Agreement of the implementation of the Agenda 2000 proposals for co-financing the Common Agricultural Policy in the event of (a) an increase in overall support to British agriculture and (b) an increase in agricultural support provided from UK domestic funds. [71648]

Ms Hewitt: Cofinancing of the CAP would not affect overall support to agriculture, in the UK or other member states. It would increase support provided directly by member states, but reduce the support provided by the EC.

Any increase in agricultural support from UK domestic funds would, of itself, have no effect on the UK rebate. Any such increase which resulted from cofinancing would be more than matched—even after the abatement—by a reduction in UK contributions to the EU. The Commission has estimated (in its report on Own Resources) that cofinancing of 25 per cent. of CAP direct aids would reduce the UK net contribution by £146 million in 2006.

Arms Exports

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what significant inaccuracies there have been in HM Customs and Excise data relating to the value of arms exports to individual countries; [71659]

(2) what factors underlie the significant inaccuracies found in HM Customs and Excise data relating to the value of arms exports to individual countries. [71660]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answers 16 February 1999]: HM Customs and Excise collect data on exports from the UK as an input to the Balance Of Payments estimation, and to meet the needs of the UK government and business users for trade information. An extensive validation programme is undertaken on the information received by Customs to ensure suitability of the data for those purposes, but it would not be feasible thoroughly to check all export declarations under £3 million. Information specifically relating to arms exports has never had its accuracies questioned in the past.

But when the detailed arms exports data were examined, errors of country or commodity code were found which would have made the information unreliable. This information therefore had to be re-checked.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many workers he expects to benefit from the introduction of the national minimum wage in the constituency of Glasgow, Govan. [74882]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Dr. M. P. G. Pepper to Mr. Mohammad Sarwar, dated 8 March 1999:

In the absence of the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent question on the number of people who will benefit from the introduction of the proposed national minimum wage (NMW).

The New Earnings Survey (NES) can provide earnings data for small geographical areas. However, the release of NES data is restricted to figures which are derived from a sufficiently large sample of employees, and have an acceptable level of accuracy.

Estimates of the proportion of people who are currently earning below the proposed minimum wage for a range of geographical areas have been placed in the House of Commons Library under the title of 'New Earnings Survey 1998—National Minimum Wage Distribution Tables'. These include available information for the Glasgow Govan constituency. The tables provide an historical position against the 1998 values of the proposed NMW, and make no judgement on whether its introduction will have any effect on the number of jobs.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentages of suspect BSE cases were subsequently confirmed in each year from 1988 to 1997. [75062]

Mr. Nick Brown: For the years 1988–97 inclusive, the percentage of animals restricted in Great Britain as BSE suspects and subsequently confirmed as having BSE are given in the following table:

Year	Restricted	Confirmed	Percentage confirmed
1988	2,516	2,184	86.80
1989	8,447	7,137	84.49
1990	17,323	14,181	81.86
1991	30,009	25,032	83.41
1992	44,846	36,682	81.80
1993	42,931	34,370	80.06
1994	30,261	23,945	79.13
1995	17,946	14,302	79.69
1996	10,701	8,016	74.91
1997	5,607	4,312	76.90

Foie Gras Production

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of foie gras production within the EU. [74832]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 5 March 1999]: We are opposed to the force feeding of ducks and geese to produce foie gras—a practice which is not followed in the United Kingdom. We have therefore been glad to have the opportunity, in the Standing Committee of the European Convention for the Protection of Animals Kept for Farming Purposes, to join in the negotiation of a Recommendation on the welfare of ducks and geese. We are pressing there for the highest standards that can be negotiated, as Recommendations adopted by the Council of Europe in this way subsequently serve as the basis for EU Directives.

Genetically Modified Foods

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what powers the Government have to ban the import of genetically modified food. [74828]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Under Article 12 of the EC Novel Foods Regulation (258/97), a Member State may act to either temporarily restrict or suspend the trade in, and the use of, an approved novel food or food ingredient in its territory if as a result of new information, or a reassessment of existing information, it has detailed grounds for believing that its use endangers human health or the environment. In such cases it is required to immediately inform the European Commission of its decision. The European Commission then has three months from the date of referral to resolve the matter or adopt the Member State's proposed measure. Under the World Trade Organisation Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures, WTO members have the right to take measures necessary for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health, provided that these are based on scientific principles and are not maintained without sufficient scientific evidence.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress made on the abolition of milk quotas in the EU. [75047]

Mr. Rooker: In the negotiations which are continuing in the Agriculture Council my right hon. Friend is continuing to press for a substantial reform of the dairy regime including a clear end date for milk quotas.

Lobbyists

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the role of professional lobbyists in formulating policy in his Department. [74353]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 1 March 1999]: Any contact with lobbyists by Ministers and civil servants in this Department is conducted in accordance with the "Ministerial Code and Guidance for Civil Servants: Contact with Lobbyists".

Decommissioning

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what projects Spain spent the funding it received under the EU scheme to reduce fishing levels. [74505]

Mr. Morley: We do not have details of actual spending by Spain under Council Regulation 3699/93 during the current structural programme (1994–99). However their planned spending on measures to reduce fishing effort during this period, as set out in their fisheries aid programme approved by the European Commission, was as follows:

Measure	Projects	EU aid [1]	National aid [1]
Decommissioning
Objective 1	700	275.0	118.0
Non Objective 1	200	35.9	35.9
Joint Enterprises
Objective 1	55	70.0	30.0
Non Objective	4	3.5	3.5
Temporary Joint Ventures
Objective 1	30	11.0	5.0

[1] Mecu

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many vessels have been scrapped under the EU scheme to reduce fishing levels by (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Spain, (c) Italy, (d) Portugal, (e) Greece, (f) France, (g) Germany, (h) the Netherlands and (i) Denmark; [74502]

(2) what the funding received by the UK under the EU scheme to reduce fishing levels was spent on. [74534]

Mr. Morley: Under the current EU scheme provided for in Council Regulation 3699/93, 547 vessels have been decommissioned in the UK at public expense. In recognition of their historical significance, a small number of these were placed in the care of registered museums rather than scrapped. My Department does not have this information for other member states, although information on changes in the tonnage and power of all member states' fleets up to the end of 1996 was published in the European Commission's report on the outcome of the third Multi-Annual Guidance Programme. This was the subject of MAFF Explanatory Memorandum Number 9893/97 submitted on 28 July 1997.

This accounts for all of the £14,375,370 received by the UK in reimbursement from the EU towards the cost of permanent reductions in fishing capacity.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if decommissioning money received by the United Kingdom under the EU scheme to reduce fishing levels was made available in the United Kingdom to vessels fishing outside the EU waters; [74503]

(2) what proportion of vessels scrapped under the EU scheme to reduce fishing levels were fishing outside the EU waters. [74504]

Mr. Morley: UK decommissioning schemes under Council Regulation 3699/93 have been limited to vessels holding licences authorising them to fish in Community waters. Although this has included certain vessels also authorised to fish outside EU waters, no vessels with material records of fishing outside EU waters have been decommissioned at public expense.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what determined the levels of funding received by (a) Spain and (b) the United Kingdom under the EU scheme to reduce fishing levels. [74506]

Mr. Morley: Funds for measures covered by Council Regulation 3699/93 were allocated by the European Union to Member States on the basis of programmes for structural aid for 1994–99. Account was taken of a number of factors including respective fleet sizes and the relative development of the regions concerned. Funding actually paid by the EU to Member States is determined by the amount of eligible expenditure that has been incurred.

Local Authority Inspections (Restaurants)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what national statistics are compiled by his Department in respect of local restaurant inspections carried out by local authorities. [74538]

Mr. Rooker: Statistics on inspections of restaurants and other caterers (as a single category) are compiled by the Ministry from returns submitted by local authorities in the United Kingdom as part of the information for the annual return we are required to make to the Commission under article 14 of the Council Directive on the official control of foodstuffs (89/397/EEC).

A copy of the latest return and summary statistics for the United Kingdom and for England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland separately were recently placed in the Library of the House.

Imported Meats (Antibiotics)

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the use of antibiotics in imported meats. [74695]

Mr. Rooker: The use of antibiotic feed additives outside the EU and the consequences for imported meats was considered by the Council of Agriculture Ministers and the EU Commission following the recent decision to ban the use of certain antibiotic growth promoters. The Council and Commission issued a joint declaration which emphasises the importance of protecting consumers' health and the need not to prejudice the competitive position of European producers, whilst complying with the Union's international commitments. The Council called for a report from the Commission before 30 June 199 which will examine how to ensure that third countries comply with rules for feed additives, in particular antibiotics, which are at least equivalent to those laid down at Community level.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to persuade EU partners, when undertaking the review of Council Directive 91/628/EEC required by Article 13 of that Directive, to abandon the long distance transport of live farm animals throughout the European Union and replace such transport with a trade in meat and carcases; and if he will make a statement. [74324]

Mr. Morley: We attach great importance to this review, which is required to take place this year. We will be pressing the European Commission to bring it forward to time. In contacts with other Member States in the run-up to the review, we shall continue to press the case for reduced journey times to slaughter, for the highest welfare standards to be set and our view that a carcase trade is preferable to long distance live transports for slaughter.

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of what proportion of consignments of live sheep exported from the UK he has requested in the last year the competent authorities in other Member States to confirm that the arrangements set out in the route plan for giving animals rest, liquid and food are adhered to; and if he will make a statement. [74322]

Mr. Morley: Monitoring compliance with route plans once sheep have left Great Britain is the responsibility of the Member States concerned. Officials of this Department maintain contacts with their opposite numbers in the other Member States to try and ensure that there is effective enforcement and that information concerning contraventions is sent back to us. We cannot expect the competent authorities concerned to check on large numbers of consignments nominated by us, but they have helped us on a case by case basis on a small proportion of consignments in the last year. We also look to the European Commission to fulfil its responsibility to ensure that Member States implement and enforce the requirements.

Animals (Religious Slaughter)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list the major outlets for religiously slaughtered meat not consumed by adherents, indicating how many tonnes entered the food chain for the last year for which figures are available; [73324]

(2) what tonnage of animals religiously slaughtered in Britain in the last year for which figures are available was exported overseas; and to which countries. [73321]

Mr. Morley: Figures on these matters do not separately distinguish meat produced by the religious slaughter of animals.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many slaughterhouses there are in the UK; how many undertake religious slaughter; and what is the average number of times that (a) slaughterhouses undertaking religious slaughter and (b) other slaughterhouses have been inspected in each of the last two years. [73686]

Mr. Morley: Details of licensed slaughterhouses in England and Wales are published in the Meat Hygiene Enforcement Report, which is placed in the Library of the House each month. Information is not held on those adopting religious methods of slaughter or the average number of times these methods are used. A member of the Meat Hygiene Service inspection team is present every day during operating periods.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to label religiously slaughtered meat. [73346]

Mr. Morley: We have no such plans at present.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each species the total number of animals religiously slaughtered in the UK for the last year for which figures are available. [73484]

Mr. Morley: Information is not kept separately for the numbers of animals slaughtered by the religious or by other approved methods. The next biennial review of welfare at slaughter standards by the Meat Hygiene Service, which will take place later this year, has been designed to provide information on slaughter practices.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list (a) the breaches of the approved killing methods his inspectors have discovered over the last two years in slaughterhouses undertaking religious slaughter and (b) the penalties imposed on the operators in each case. [73498]

Mr. Morley: Official Veterinary Surgeons of the Meat Hygiene Service monitor compliance with welfare at slaughter legislation in licensed slaughterhouses daily during operation and take on-the-spot action to put right any problems found. Figures that are available relate to prosecutions, and none of the prosecutions taken under the Welfare of Animals (Slaughter or Killing) Regulations 1995 relates to breaches of approved killing methods for religious slaughter.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the approved killing method for each species undergoing religious slaughter. [73320]

Mr. Morley: When slaughter is by the Jewish or Muslim method the Welfare of Animals (Slaughter or Killing) Regulations 1995 provide an exemption from the general requirement for animals to be stunned. Slaughter must be carried out without inflicting unnecessary suffering: in the case of cattle, sheep and goats by the severance of both carotid arteries and both jugular veins by rapid, uninterrupted movements of a knife and, in the case of turkeys, domestic fowl, guinea-fowl, ducks, geese or quail by the severance of both carotid arteries by rapid and uninterrupted movements of a knife.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the proportion of an animal carcase religiously slaughtered which is consumed by adherents of the religion concerned; and what use is made of remaining edible parts of the carcase. [73483]

Mr. Morley: The acceptability for consumption of carcases and parts of carcases is a matter for the religious authorities.

Genetic Material

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who (a) commissioned and (b) carried out the tests conducted on Ciba-Geigy maize gluten feed to establish the effects of processing on modified and non-modified genetic material. [74429]

Mr. Rooker: In 1996, the Ministry commissioned tests at the Laboratory of the Government Chemist on samples of maize gluten feed, specifically to determine the effect of processing on DNA.

Japanese Whaling

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the letter from the Parliamentary Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), ref 123733, on Japanese whaling, if he will make a statement on the bilateral meeting with Japanese officials held on 8 February. [72895]

Mr. Morley: Whaling was only one of the issues discussed at the meeting in question; a large number of other environmental issues were discussed. The UK delegation made clear the UK's opposition to Japan's whaling activities, stressing in particular, our disappointment that Japan continues to whale under special permit and to ignore all IWC calls to halt scientific whaling in the Southern Ocean Sanctuary. We emphasised that the UK view does not consider that there is any scientific justification for Japanese scientific whaling and called upon Japan to restructure its research programmes so that its objectives could be achieved by non-lethal means. We also drew attention to the fact that the UK was not alone in expressing these views; a large majority of IWC members have also made clear their opposition to Japanese scientific whaling. Japan reiterated its formal position on this issue. I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to raise this issue with Japan at every appropriate opportunity.

Hops

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the advice given by the EU Commission with regard to payment to hop producers under Regulation 1098/98 for hops planted during the winter 1997–98; and what discussion he has had with the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce concerning the interpretation of that advice. [75282]

Mr. Rooker: MAFF has undertaken extensive discussion with the Intervention Board about payments to hop growers under the new EU special temporary measures for hops. Advice from the Commission has been sought and further clarification is awaited before any final decisions are taken.

Marriage Preparation Schemes

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the marriage preparation pilot schemes. [74808]

Mr. Hoon: The Lord Chancellor's Department funded a programme of 13 marriage support pilot projects in 1997–98. Three of the projects were concerned with marriage preparation.

The Department assessed the effectiveness of each project in terms of its achievement of specific aims and objectives, and its cost effectiveness. Take-up of the marriage preparation offered was limited, but those who did participate generally found it helpful.

Mediation Schemes

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the mediation pilot schemes under the Family Law Act 1996. [74809]

Mr. Hoon: Research has been carried out, by a consortium led by the University of Bristol on behalf of the Legal Aid Board, into the mediation pilot schemes run by the Board. This research is not yet complete and it is therefore too early for the Government to make any assessment of those pilot schemes.

Family Law Act 1996

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will postpone the introduction of the remaining provisions of the Family Law Act 1996, until after the implementation of the initiatives set out in the Government consultation document "Supporting Families". [74810]

Mr. Hoon: The Government have indicated that they will implement Part II of the Family Law Act during the year 2000. It is too early to say whether the outcome of the consultation paper "Supporting Families" will lead to any of the initiatives in that document being implemented.

Deregulation

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to bring forward proposals under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994. [74953]

Mr. Hoon: It would not be appropriate to announce any specific deregulation order proposals at this time as they are subject to detailed consultation with all interested parties.

However, I propose to use the contracting out order-making power to facilitate the contracting out of functions relating to the summoning of jurors under section 2(6) of the Juries Act 1974.

TREASURY

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate the total number of people who will receive the proposed working families tax credit if everyone entitled to the credit were to take up their entitlement; and what would be the cost in 2000–01 of the credit on that basis; [70078]

(2) what assumption was made, for the purposes of forecasting the public expenditure consequences of the working families tax credit, about the percentage of those who will be eligible for the new credit who will take up that entitlement. [70077]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 February 1999]: In forecasting the cost of the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC), it has been assumed that the behavioural response of those households eligible to claim WFTC will be broadly similar to that in Family Credit. This response partly depends on net incomes and differences in the shape of the income distribution of those eligible for Family Credit and WFTC and means that the assumed take-up percentage is slightly higher for WFTC. The assumptions for costing WFTC are consistent with other welfare-to-work measures where the costings and entitlement figures do not take into account any benefit savings from people moving from welfare to work. It is estimated that, if everyone entitled to the WFTC were to take up their entitlement, in 2000–01 there would be about 1.65 million in receipt of the credit, with a total expenditure of about £4.9 billion.

Tax Ready Reckoner

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to publish the "Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs 1999;" and if he will make a statement. [75352]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Copies have today been deposited in the Library of the House.

Student Loans

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the second student loan debt sale; and what assessment he has made of the costs. [76048]

Mr. Milburn: I welcome the successful second sale of student loan debt of around £1bn announced today, Official Report, House of Lords, columns 20–21, by my noble friend the Minister for Education and Employment.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained the Government's approach to the student loan debt sales to the House on 10 July 1997, Official Report, columns 607–08. The overriding policy considerations which determined that approach were as follows.

The Government are committed to the development of a wide range of public-private partnerships which involve a transfer of risk to the private sector. As with the first sale, this sale will shift much of the default risk to the private sector, which has much more experience in dealing with such risks. The sales will also enable the markets to establish a clearer understanding of student loans and could in future encourage financial institutions to play a more direct role in the provision of student support.

In addition, the Government were elected on the basis of a manifesto pledge to work within the spending plans already announced for 1997–98 and 1998–99. This, and our other economic pledges on inflation and taxes, were designed to create the conditions for economic stability and a platform for sustained growth. Going ahead with both student loan debt sales has played a critical role in enabling us to keep this pledge.

These overriding objectives were paramount in the decision to proceed with the first and second debt sales.

The Government accept that the sales will result in the payment of subsidies to purchasers of the loan debt, much of which flows from our commitment to preserve the existing favourable terms for borrowers. We accept that the level of subsidy will vary from year to year in the light of economic conditions, including movement in interest rates, and that it will vary between the sales, as each is based on a separate competition.

The extra cost of selling loan debt under the first sale compared with the cost of retaining the loans was calculated at £50m-£60m, in accordance with the guidance in the Green Book, "Appraisal and Evaluation in Central Government", published by my Department. Using the same methodology, the additional costs of the second sale will be £85m-£100m. The difference between the two costs reflects changing circumstances at the time of the two sales, including market conditions and the maturity of the portfolio of loans sold. A strong competition was run and the most competitive bid has been accepted. We have therefore achieved the most competitive outcome consistent with our policy objectives.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of people who will benefit from the introduction of the national minimum wage in (a) the Tamworth constituency, (b) Staffordshire and (c) the West Midlands. [75737]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Brian Jenkins, dated 9 March 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the number of people who will benefit from the introduction of the proposed national minimum wage (NMW).

The New Earnings Survey (NES) can provide earnings data for small geographical areas. However, the release of NES data is restricted to figures that are derived from a sufficiently large sample of employees, and have an acceptable level of accuracy. Accordingly, no estimates for the parliamentary constituency of Tamworth can be given.

Estimates of the proportion of people who are currently earning below the proposed minimum wage for a range of geographical areas have been placed in the House of Commons Library under the title of New Earnings Survey 1998 - National Minimum Wage Distribution Tables. These include available information for Staffordshire and the West Midlands. The tables provide an historical position against the 1998 values of the proposed NMW, and make no judgement on whether its introduction will have any effect on the number of jobs.

Dividends

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Tewkesbury dated 22 July 1998, regarding tax payable on dividends by non-taxpayers. [75762]

Dawn Primarolo: I have responded to the hon. Member's letter.

Government Borrowing

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of the Government's borrowing programme in 1999–2000. [76047]

Ms Hewitt: The main details of the Government's borrowing programme are set out in Annex B of the Financial Statement and Budget Report, published today. Copies of the financing remits for 1999–2000 set by the Government for the Debt Management Office and for National Savings have been placed in the Libraries of the House. They will also be included in the 1999–2000 Debt Management Report to be published on 17 March, and copies of the Report will be made available to the Libraries of the House on that day. The report will also set out the Government's debt management policy, review the Government's borrowing programme in 1998–99, and give details of the Government's borrowing programme in 1999–2000.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Summer Schools Programme

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment has been made by Ofsted of the summer schools programme; and what changes will be made this year. [73198]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 9 March 1999]: I have asked Chris Woodhead, HM Chief Inspector of Schools, to write to my hon. Friend to address the first part of his question regarding Ofsted's assessment of the summer schools programme, and for a copy of his letter to be placed in the Library.

This summer, the numeracy programme will expand from a pilot of 51 schools to over 300 schools and 9,000 pupils.

For Literacy the number of schools participating in this summer's programme will rise from over 500 schools to 900 schools catering for over 27,000 pupils. Each school will also introduce a literacy intervention programme during the first four terms of secondary school, to support those children who transfer from primary to secondary with poor literacy skills.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what evaluation he has undertaken of the effectiveness of literacy summer schools. [74772]

Ms Estelle Morris: Evaluation of the 1998 Summer Schools Programme was carried out by the National Foundation for Educational Research. A report of the key findings will be made available to Local Education Authorities next week. Copies will be placed in the Library.

Cultural Diversity

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what additional resources his Department plans to make available in order to support the training of teachers and head teachers to implement the new emphasis in the national curriculum on valuing cultural diversity and preventing racism, as proposed in the Macpherson report; [74548]

(2) if valuing cultural diversity and preventing racism will be designated as a priority area for school management and included as a compulsory element in the new qualifications for deputy and head teachers. [74549]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government will shortly be publishing a detailed response and action plan about all the recommendations in the Macpherson report, including those relating to education and the national curriculum.

We are committed to an inclusive education service which enables and encourages all children to achieve to the best of their abilities. As part of our vision for a modernised teaching profession, set out in the Green Paper, "Teachers, Meeting the Challenge of Change", published on 3 December, we are determined to ensure teachers have the skills and knowledge they need effectively to raise standards for all their pupils.

The national standards for teachers, published by the Teacher Training Agency (TTA) and endorsed by Government, which span qualified teacher status through to headship, make clear the need for teachers, on entry to the profession and at all stages in their careers, to have the skills and understanding necessary to meet the needs of an ethnically diverse pupil body. The national standards for head teachers, which underpin the training programmes for aspiring and serving head teachers, make clear the responsibility of heads for ensuring that pupils are aware of the ethnic and cultural diversity in their schools and in society and that there are positive strategies for developing good race relations and for dealing with racial harassment. The TTA also will be producing supplementary materials for Initial Teacher Training providers to ensure that new teachers have the skills to deal with ethnic and cultural diversity in schools.

Class Sizes

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many additional full-time qualified teachers have been identified by local education authorities in their plans for reducing infant class sizes submitted to his Department as being required to implement (a) the required reduction in infant class sizes in the school years 1999–2000 and 2000–01 and (b) measures required under paragraph 10 of the Schedule to the Education (Plans for Reducing Infant Class Sizes) (England) Regulations 1998. [75489]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 8 March 1999]: We have allocated £71,882,000 to fund 4,308 additional teachers to reduce infant class sizes in 1999–2000 (including 1,527 teachers funded from September 1998). For the following two financial years, we will be monitoring local authorities' progress in implementing their plans before making allocations to fund the teachers required. As a result of the Comprehensive Spending Review we have made available £160 million for the revenue costs in each of those years of achieving the pledge. Local education authorities confirmed in their plans the arrangements they have put in place to ensure that no child will have to attend a school more than a reasonable distance from home.

Sunderland City TEC

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will allow Sunderland City Training and Enterprise Council to retain the proceeds of sale of an asset purchased with funds deriving from his Department. [76008]

Mr. Mudie: I have agreed that Sunderland City Training and Enterprise Council can use the proceeds of sale to lever in matched European funds to further develop their Business Innovation Centre thus creating more business opportunities and jobs for the area.

Student Loans

Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the competition to sell a second part of the Student Loan Portfolio. [76009]

Mr. Mudie: My noble Friend the Minister for Education and Employment has today, Official Report, House of Lords, columns 20–21, announced the conclusion of the second sale of a portfolio of student loans to the private sector for around £1 billion in a written answer to Lord Burlison. The sale has been achieved after a very vigorous competition and we have accepted the most competitive bid. A consortium of the Nationwide Building Society and Deutsche Bank AG was the successful bidder. As a result, the portfolio will be sold to HONOURS Trustee Limited, a company formed for the purpose of acquiring the assets.

The loans sold are those made under the original loan scheme. None of the new income contingent loans introduced at the beginning of the current academic year are involved.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has confirmed the policy considerations which have determined the Government's approach to student loan debt sales in a written answer today, Official Report, columns 101–02, to my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Lawrence).

HONOURS Trustee Limited have appointed the Student Loans Company, the existing administrator, to administer the sold loans on their behalf. Borrowers who are currently repaying their loans or who have made deferment arrangements will consequently notice little change. We have legislated previously to ensure that the position of borrowers is protected. Borrowers will retain their existing rights of deferment, where their income is below 85% of average earnings, and interest rates will continue to be linked solely to inflation.

These rights mean that original scheme student loans are provided at subsidised rates. Subsidies will therefore be paid to the purchaser to reflect this. During the 1999–2000 financial year a subsidy of about £64m will be paid.

Part of the gross subsidy payment will be repaid to the Government through the administration charges paid to the Student Loans Company and tax receipts on private sector profits. Given the value of loans sold, and that some of the loans will be outstanding for a considerable length of time, the estimated net present value of these subsidies is broadly in the region of £395-£405m. This compares with estimated net present value costs of around £310m which we would have incurred had the loans remained publicly owned. The estimated cost to the Government of selling these loans will therefore be in the region of £85-£100m or 25–30% above the cost of keeping loans in the public sector over the lifetime of the portfolio.

The agreement between the Government and HONOURS Trustee Limited, with commercially confidential information removed, will be placed in the Library of the House on completion of the sale.

School Funding

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each local education authority in England, the funding made available to date through (a) the Standards Fund and (b) the New Deal for Schools. [73537]

Ms Estelle Morris: Details of funding made available through the Standards Fund for 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, and through the New Deal for Schools for 1997–98 and 1998–99, are given in tables that have been placed in the Library. The allocation of the grants for New Deal for Schools for 1999–2000 have not yet been made. For the Standards Fund the figures shown in tables include the grant made by the Department and the contribution made by the local education authority.

Prisons (Drugs)

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the amount of illegal drugs discovered in Northern Ireland prisons in each of the last three years, broken down by type of drug. [71400]

Mr. Ingram: The amount of illegal drugs discovered in Northern Ireland prisons in each of the last three years is shown in the following table:

Cannabis	314 grammes	1,176 grammes	79 grammes
Ecstasy	6 tablets	121 tablets	29 tablets
LSD	—	1 square	—
Amphetamines	—	—	2.5 grammes
Anabolic Steroids	—	2x10 ml bottles	6x10 ml bottles
Other tablets[2]	389	981	182

[1] Up to 31 December 1998
[2] Mostly prescribed drugs found on a non-prescribed basis

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what public funds have been spent on mandatory drug tests in Northern Ireland prisons in each of the last three years. [71401]

Mr. Ingram: There is no mandatory drug testing in Northern Ireland prisons. The Northern Ireland Prison Service drugs strategy focuses on four key action areas of control, care, education and information. As part of the strategy, a voluntary testing scheme is currently in operation on a pilot basis in one prison establishment.

Schizophrenia Psychoses

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of those convicted of crimes in Northern Ireland in the last year for which figures are available have ever been admitted to National Health Service mental illness hospitals with a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses. [73355]

Mr. McFall: The subject of criminal convictions is a matter for the Lord Chancellor's Department. However, I understand from that Department that these figures are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mater Hospital

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which hospital services Her Majesty's Government are obliged to maintain at the Mater Hospital, Belfast, under the terms of the 1971 Deed of Arrangement. [74453]

Mr. McFall: The Mater Infirmorum Hospital entered the health service under the 1971 Deed of Arrangement, which secured the preservation of the Roman Catholic character and association of the hospital. The Deed set out specific requirements for the general administration of the hospital and provided for a review of the internal allocation of beds and facilities and for the preparation of a scheme for the initial reconstruction and modernisation of the hospital's buildings and facilities. The deed of Arrangement does not require the maintenance of specific services at the hospital. Whatever services are provided must however preserve the character and associations of the Hospital.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what extension plans have been prepared for the Mater Hospital, Belfast; and if she will make a statement. [74454]

Mr. McFall: The Trust have recently completed an extension to provide a 50-bed acute psychiatric unit. This was approved by the HSSE. A building programme for the construction of a new three storey block containing wards, a day procedures unit and a pharmacy has now started. This will be funded by the Mater Hospital Trustees and does not require Departmental funding. The Trust also has plans for the refurbishment and upgrading of the original building. These have not yet been submitted for Departmental approval.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what extension plans for the Mater Hospital, Belfast, have had approval from the Department of Health. [74495]

Mr. McFall: A 50 bed acute psychiatric unit has recently been completed. No further extension plans for the Mater Hospital have been approved by the Department at present.

Maternity Services

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made on the 1997 recommendations by Professor Donaldson's Medical Review Panel on (a) the development of a Province-wide strategic plan for maternity services and (b) smaller obstetric units without 24 hour on-site paediatric cover. [74496]

Mr. McFall: As with other hospital services, strategic decisions about maternity services will be a matter for the new Northern Ireland Assembly. An analysis of the issues involved was contained in the paper "Putting it Right", which I presented to the Assembly on 14 December 1998. It envisages the concentration of acute hospital services, including maternity services, at Area and Regional level, supported by a network of local hospitals. Board reviews of acute hospital services, some of which have already taken place will be completed in the near future, will help to inform the Assembly's consideration of the issues involved.

Task Forces

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will publish a list of (1) task forces and (2) policy reviews established by her Department since May 1997 which (a) had external members recruited by way of public advertisement, and details of any person so appointed and (b) engaged in public consultation exercises, and the form that these took. [74471]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information for the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments is as follows:

(a) Nil

Most task forces and reviews are short-term bodies established to give thorough consideration to important and difficult issues. External members are invited to sit on some reviews and task forces because they are able to contribute specific experience and expertise. In such cases, public advertising would be inappropriate and disproportionate.

Human Rights Commission

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the known (a) religious and (b) political affiliations of the Commissioners recently appointed to the new body on human rights for Northern Ireland. [75291]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The Secretary of State announced on 18 January and 1 March appointments to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. There are 10 Commissioners including the Chief Commissioner. The religious background of candidates is established for monitoring purposes only. It is not the Government's policy to release the religious affiliation of each member, but we are satisfied that the Commissioners, as a group, are representative of the community in Northern Ireland. Candidates are asked to declare political activity over the last 10 years; only one of those appointed had declared any political affiliation, which was to the SDLP and the Women's Coalition.

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for appointment to the Human Rights Commission were received; on what dates the posts were advertised; and in what journals. [75279]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The contracting of air carriers to transport post to the United States of America is a commercial matter for The Post Office. The air transport of post from the United States Postal Services to the United Kingdom is a matter for that administration.

Credit Unions

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to allow credit unions to gain easier access to post offices to (a) encourage saving and (b) publicise their activities. [73914]

Mr. Ian McCartney [holding answer 3 March 1999]: Arrangements for access to post offices for credit unions are an operational and commercial matter for the Post Office and the credit unions. However, I have asked the Post Office to consider what actions can be taken to improve working relations between them and the credit unions, within the context of the Post Office's strategic plans.

Black-start Facility, Keadby

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is yet in a position to make his decision on Keadby Generation Ltd's application to construct a black-start facility at its Keadby power station in North Lincolnshire. [76013]

Mr. Battle: I have today granted consent under Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to Keadby Generation Ltd's application to construct a 25MW gas-fired black start facility (the extension) at its existing power station at Keadby. The decisions have been taken in accordance with the policy set out in the White Paper entitled 'Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee' (Cm 4071).

I have also given Keadby Generation Ltd. clearance to build the extension under Section 14(1) of the Energy Act 1976 and directed that planning permission for the extension be deemed to be granted, subject to 36 planning conditions agreed with the North Lincolnshire Council. These conditions meet issues raised by the Council and others.

Decisions on other applications under consideration will be announced in due course.

Copies of the Press Notice and decision letter are being placed in the Library of the House.

Children (Employment Law)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to report the outcome of his review of Employment Law relating to children. [74811]

Mr. Spellar: Each vessel costs between £600,000 and £950,000, and they have been in service since 1994. Details of the numbers operated are withheld under exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of repairing the damage to the Royal Marines' fast insertion craft incurred on 19 January in Norway. [72645]

Mr. Spellar: The cost is estimated to be £106,000.

Infantry Exercises (France)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries which had armed forces involved in the three infantry exercises in France carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72928]

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what systems he has in place to ensure that policies being developed by his Department are subject to a crime impact (a) assessment and (b) audit and are not likely to lead to enhanced criminal opportunities. [72693]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 24 February 1999]: In addition to the regular audit of systems carried out by our Internal Audit organisation, my Department has a Fraud Analysis Unit which is tasked with the evaluation of suspected irregularity in the conduct of MOD business. Lessons learnt are incorporated in the process of policy development. The Department also has, in the Ministry of Defence Police, an independent constabulary whose tasks include the prevention and investigation of crime and fraud in the Defence environment; local policing plans have been developed to reflect the crime concerns at areas policed by the Force.

Single Currency

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to issue information from his Department to help the public make an informed decision when they vote on the single currency. [73588]

Mr. George Robertson: Any plans by the Government to issue information during a referendum campaign on whether or not the UK should join the single currency would be made in light of the Government's response to the recommendations from the Neill Committee on the conduct of referendums. The Government will announce their conclusions on those recommendations when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary publishes a White Paper and draft Bill before the summer recess.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the subject areas within his Department's responsibilities which will be covered by the information campaign on Britain's membership of a single currency. [73668]

Mr. George Robertson: The Treasury will continue its dialogue with key external bodies to determine what information the public and business would need at each stage of the changeover process. Any information campaign would cover key concerns that the public and business may have. Chapter eight of the Treasury's Outline National Changeover Plan provides further information. Copies of the Plan are available in the Library of the House.

(2) what is his assessment of the principal benefits of the two desert exercises in Jordan carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72976]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 1 March 1999]: Exercise DESERT SONG comprised two exercises involving members of the UK and Jordanian armed forces and was conducted in Jordan in September and October 1997. These exercises were intended to maintain and develop the capacity of the participating personnel to conduct operations in a desert environment, and are assessed to have succeeded in their aim.

Joint Venture Oversight Group

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what dates the US/UK Joint Venture Oversight Group on the defence response to the threat posed by chemical and biological weapons is due to meet in 1999; in which country each meeting is due to take place; which of his Department's officials attend these meetings; and if any other Government Departments attend these meetings. [74257]

Mr. George Robertson: It is currently envisaged that the Joint Venture Oversight Group will meet twice a year and that the meetings will be held alternately in the United States and the UK. The inaugural meeting of the Group having taken place in the United States in December 1998, the next will be held in the UK in June.

The principal UK official for these meetings is the MOD Deputy Policy Director. The composition of his supporting team depends on the business of each meeting, but is likely normally to include staff with responsibility for relevant policy issues, operational assessment and scientific research. Other Departments would be represented if required.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what powers of jurisdiction over civilians (a) not employed by his Department and (b) employed by his Department the Ministry of Defence Police Agency has. [74309]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on 2 March 1999, Official Report, column 655, by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence, which outlined the circumstances in which MOD Police officers have the powers and privileges of constables. There are a variety of circumstances in which MOD Police officers might be able to exercise constabulary powers in relation to civilians whether or not they are employed by the Ministry of Defence.

Gifts (Weapons and Military Equipment)

Mr. John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries which have received gifts of (a) weapons and (b) other military equipment from Her Majesty's Government since 1 May 1997, indicating the (i) types and (ii) value of equipment given. [74679]

All these items were surplus to requirements. The main battle tanks were gifted to museums.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the key milestones and timetable for the Value-added Acquisition and Logistics for Ultimate Efficiency Programme; and if he will list the names and appointments of (a) civil servants, (b) military personnel and (c) external consultants on the programme. [74660]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The VALUE programme is analysing the processes and key data elements of defence logistics, in support of the formation of the Defence Logistics Organisation and the implementation of the Smart Procurement Initiative. The main analytical work will be completed by 31 March 1999; the remaining work, which is due to be completed by 30 June 1999, will support the establishment of a programme of continuous improvement in defence logistics.

Members of the VALUE team are listed on the MOD website (http:/www.mod.uk). No external consultants are directly employed on the VALUE work.

Smart Procurement

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names and appointments of the (a) civil servants, (b) military personnel and (c) external consultants who make up the Smart Procurement Implementation Team. [74647]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The Implementation Team for the Smart Procurement Initiative planning phase comprises 48 full and part-time members. Team members include 25 civilian and 15 military personnel and 8 representatives from industry. The Implementation Team is being supported during the planning phase by external consultants from McKinsey & Co and KPMG, supplemented by occasional temporary attachments of civilian and military personnel on ad hoc activities. The names of some members of the Smart Procurement Implementation Team are included on the team's website (www.mod.uk/policy/smart).

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the impact of the recent merger of BAe and Marconi on his Department's Smart Procurement policy. [74643]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The MOD is currently assessing the impact of the proposed merger and will be advising the regulatory authorities in due course. It is not, however, expected to have any impact on our Smart Procurement policy.

Strategic Defence Review

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names and appointments of the (a) civil servants and (b) military personnel of the Strategic Defence Review Implementation Team. [74645]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 4 March 1999]: The central Strategic Defence Review Implementation Team is a small civilian/military team of 9 personnel including support staff. The team has responsibility for monitoring and chasing progress on implementation of the Strategic Defence Review.

The Implementation Team works closely with many others across the Ministry of Defence and the Armed Forces engaged in implementing particular aspects of the Review.

Scout Reconnaissance Vehicle Programme

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the project definition, milestones and costs of the armoured scout reconnaissance vehicle programme. [69571]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 8 February 1999]: The Armoured Scout Reconnaissance Vehicle is a collaborative programme between the UK and the USA to study candidate technologies to meet our common requirements for battlefield reconnaissance for the Army of the future. Contracts for a 42 month Project Definition Phase were awarded to the SIKA and LANCER consortia on 29 January 1999. No commitment has been made to the programme beyond the Project Definition Phase. Decisions will be made following a Balance of Investment Study, which will determine the optimum solution to the Land Commander's information gathering requirement. As part of the wider study, we will also be investigating the use of Unmanned Aerial and Land Vehicles.

The total cost to the UK for the joint elements of the Project Definition Phase contracts will be around £90 million, excluding VAT. In addition, the UK will be spending around £7 million, excluding VAT, on UK specific issues.

Holy Loch

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the projected cost of the Holy Loch clean-up of debris left behind by US visiting forces has risen to between £8 million and £10 million. [75116]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The estimated costs of the Holy Loch clean-up operations are based on the practical experience gained during operations covered by the current contract. This has led to the forecasted final expenditure of £8 million to £10 million.

Iraq

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total weight of bombs dropped by British forces on Iraq (a) during Operation Desert Fox and (b) subsequently. [75671]

Mr. George Robertson: During Operation DESERT FOX in December last year, a total of 28,560kg of bombs were dropped by British forces on Iraqi military targets. Subsequently, British forces have dropped 20,520kg of bombs in the course of operations over Iraq.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent RAF pilots forced down in Iraq will be protected by the terms of the Geneva Convention; and if he will make a statement. [75670]

Mr. George Robertson: The Geneva Conventions are applicable in any international armed conflict, whether or not a state of war exists between the parties; the application of the Conventions are not dependent upon a formal declaration of war or hostilities. Accordingly, any of our aircrew forced down in Iraq would be entitled to the status of prisoners of war. We would expect Iraq to meet all its obligations under international law, including all applicable international conventions.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review his Department's decision to reduce the number of Tristar flights to the Falkland Islands. [75756]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The reduction in the number of RAF Tristar Airbridge flights to the Falkland Islands by one flight per calendar month was one of a range of efficiency proposals identified by the Strategic Defence Review. It represents a rationalisation of the use of Tristar aircraft, following technical improvements that allow them to carry an increased payload, rather than representing any significant reduction to the overall capacity of the Airbridge. Final arrangements for the implementation of this measure are still under consideration.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Officers (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers from an Asian or Afro-Caribbean background hold the rank of (a) chief constable, (b) assistant chief constable and (c) chief superintendent. [74539]

Mr. Boateng: Currently there are (a) no Chief Constables, (b) one Assistant Chief Constable, (c) three Chief Superintendents (one currently on temporary promotion) and six Superintendents from an Asian or Afro-Caribbean background.

The rank of Chief Superintendent was abolished on 1 April 1995. At that time, the number of existing Chief Superintendents maintained their rank and a number of forces continue to use the designation.

Equine Welfare

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations he has received from equine welfare organisations on the tethering of horses; [75122]

(2) what assessment he has made of the welfare standards of the existing legislation on the tethering of horses; and if he will make a statement. [75120]

Mr. George Howarth: We have not received recent representations from equine welfare organisations about the tethering of horses.

The welfare of horses that are tethered is safeguarded by the general protection afforded by the Protection of Animals Act 1911 and the Protection Against Cruel Tethering Act 1988. Additional protection is provided by the Abandonment of Animals Act 1960.

Under the 1911 Act, it is an offence to cause any unnecessary suffering to any domestic or captive animal. The Protection Against Cruel Tethering Act 1988 created a specific offence under the 1911 Act of causing unnecessary suffering to a horse by the manner of condition of its tethering. In addition, the Abandonment of Animals Act 1960 makes it an offence to abandon a domestic or captive animal, whether or not permanently, without reasonable excuse and in circumstances likely to cause suffering.

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there were in England during 1998 of individuals for their ill treatment of horses. [75121]

Mr. Boateng: Information held on the Home Office Court Proceedings Database concerning offences under the Protection of Animals Act 1911 does not distinguish individual offences within the Act or identify the species of animal involved.

London Fire Brigade

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many firefighters in the London Fire Brigade are of black or ethnic minority origin; what proportion of the total they form; and what measures are planned to increase the number of black and ethnic minority firefighters in London. [75135]

Mr. George Howarth: At 31 March 1998, there were 5,771 firefighters on the operational strength of London Fire Brigade. Of these, 249 (4.3 per cent. of the total) classified themselves as black or from an ethnic minority group.

We have announced that targets will be set for the recruitment of ethnic minority groups into the Home Office and its services. All chief fire officers have been asked to set targets to improve black and ethnic minority representation to reflect the community their brigade serves. The London Fire and Civil Defence Authority has already taken a number of initiatives of its own to increase the numbers of black and ethnic minority firefighters in London.

Horses (Nutritional Deprivation)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons he granted a project licence for the study of the effects of nutritional deprivation in the womb of horses at the Equine Fertility Unit near Newmarket, with particular reference to the cost benefit test under section 5(4) of the Animal (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986; into what severity band the procedures were placed and for what reasons; and if he will review the application of the cost benefit test in relation to these procedures. [75174]

Mr. George Howarth: The project licence authorising this work was granted in 1994. The objectives of the research were to study pregnancy in mares to determine how genetic and growth factors might affect the nutrition of the foetus, given that poor nutrition of the developing foetus can result in abortion or the birth of poorly viable offspring. The potential benefits of the work are, therefore, to the welfare of horses. It is, however, possible that the results will also be beneficial to other species, including man.

The procedures on the horses entailed mainly non-surgical recovery of uterine material from pregnant and non-pregnant animals. This involved sedation but no general anaesthesia and the procedures were classified as being of mild severity. However, in the early work under the authority of this licence, some of the procedures also involved surgery, which was classified as being of moderate severity. The overall severity for the project licence is mild.

The relevant project licence is no longer in force. If further work is to be carried out in this area, a new application will have to be made and the costs and benefits will again be weighed before deciding whether to grant a new licence.

Criminal Memoirs

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to prevent criminals profiting from the publication of (a) memoirs and (b) magazine and newspaper articles based on their criminal activities. [74879]

Mr. Boateng: In the light of the concerns expressed last year after the publication of Gitta Sereny's book 'Cries Unheard' an inter-departmental group is considering the law relating to criminal memoirs, and whether it might sensibly be strengthened. The issues raised are difficult and complex, and include how the need to prevent criminals from benefiting by publishing details of their crimes and causing distress to victims and their families can be balanced against the rights to freedom of expression set out in the European Court of Human Rights and the Human Rights Act. The working group expects to report in the summer.

Sexual Assaults

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people aged (i) under 14, (ii) 14 to 17, (iii) 18 to 20, (iv) 21 to 40, (v) 41 to 64 and (vi) 65 years and over, convicted of the offence of rape of a man in each year from 1987 to 1997 were sentenced to immediate custody; [75034]

(2) how many people aged (i) under 14, (ii) 14 to 17, (iii) 18 to 20, (iv) 21 to 40, (v) 41 to 64 and (vi) 65 years and over, convicted of the offence of indecency between males in each of the years 1987 to 1997 were sentenced to immediate custody; [75031]

(3) how many (a) prosecutions, (b) convictions and (c) cautions for the offence of indecent assault on a male there were of persons who were aged (i) under 14, (ii) 14 to 17, (iii) 18 to 20, (iv) 21 to 40, (v) 41 to 64 and (vi) 65 years and over giving in each age group how many were (1) male and (2) female, in each year between 1987 and 1997; [75032]

(4) how many (1) cautions and (2) convictions there were for the offences of (i) indecent assault on a female under 16 years, (ii) unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 16 years, (iii) indecent assault on a male under 16 years, (iv) gross indecency with a girl under 14 years, (v) unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 13 years, (vi) gross indecency with a boy under 14 years, (vii) buggery of a male under 16 years and (viii) incest in (a) 1985 and (b) 1995; and if he will indicate in each case the percentage change; [75029]

(5) in how many cases the victim of a person convicted of indecent assault or other party to an offence of indecent assault for which a conviction was secured was aged (a) under 14, (b) 14 to 17, (c) 18 to 20, (d) 21 to 40, (e) 41 to 64 and (f) 65 years and over, giving in each age group the number who were (1) male or (2) female for each year between 1987 and 1997. [75030]

Mr. Boateng: Available information is given in the tables. Information held on the Home Office Court Proceedings Database on the age of victims of the offence of indecent assault is restricted to identifying those 'under 16' and '16 and over'.

Table A: Number of persons convicted at all courts for the offence of indecent assault on a male or female by sex and age of victim, England and Wales, 1987–97

Hostels

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the national average occupancy rate in hostels in England and Wales on the latest date available; and what are his Department's relevant key performance indicators for 1998–99. [75242]

Mr. George Howarth: The average occupancy rate in approved probation and bail hostels for the year 1998–99 currently stands at 84 per cent. This is above the 83 per cent. target for the key performance indicator for hostel occupancy, which will increase to 87 per cent. in 1999–2000.

Gaming Act 1968

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responses he received to the consultation paper on modernising the Gaming Act 1968 in respect of (a) postal and group applications, (b) limited print advertising and (c) introduction of casino gaming machines; and if he will make a statement. [75219]

Mr. George Howarth: We consulted on 5 August 1998 about proposals to relax certain Gaming Act controls on casino membership, advertising and jackpot machines. The consultation period ended on 21 October.

We received 39 responses, most supporting the proposals. We have been discussing specific issues with the Gaming Board and the industry, and hope to make an announcement shortly.

Immigration Officers

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if training for immigration officers includes guidance on facilitating legitimate travellers who wish to visit family and friends in the United Kingdom. [75650]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The greater majority of passengers are, of course, entitled or qualified to enter the United Kingdom. This includes those wishing to visit family and friends here. Immigration Officers are given training which reflects this priority, with particular emphasis on professionalism, inter-personal skills and awareness of the needs and concerns of those with whom they come into contact, including the family and friends of passengers.

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what common training is given to all immigration officers. [75649]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Immigration Officers undergo a variety of common training during their careers in the Immigration Service. In particular, they are given ten weeks induction training to enable them to apply the requirements of immigration-related legislation and instructions. Areas covered include their powers and obligations, operating the controls in accordance with Government policies, interview skills, professional standards and skills such as forgery detection.

Thereafter, Immigration Officers are given consolidation training in order to reinforce their knowledge and experience, as well as more specialised training for those working in areas such as computerisation, resource management and training.

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training is given to immigration officers working in the Indian sub-continent. [75648]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: All Immigration Officers working abroad, including those in the sub-continent, receive a comprehensive Entry Clearance Officer course which addresses a number of issues in the operation of a faster, fairer and firmer immigration control overseas. Officers are required to demonstrate a sound knowledge and understanding of the principles of Best Practice in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and its importance in the successful management of an entry clearance operation. The course reflects the importance of treating each applicant with courtesy and respect as an individual, with particular emphasis on a professional approach to the interview process.

The four-day course is delivered by Immigration Service trainers all of whom have had recent experience in entry clearance work overseas. Areas covered include types of interviews that Entry Clearance Officers carry out and the range of different applications, including visitors and students. A substantial part of the course is devoted to the area of family settlement.

On arrival in post, they receive additional training, with particular guidance on the cultural background and life specific to the country in which they will be working. This includes those going to the sub-continent.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what the additional special payment allocated to the Metropolitan Police was for each of the years 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000; [75755]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 556, if he will set out the basis upon which the additional special payment allocated to the Metropolitan police was calculated; and what criteria were adopted; [75753]

(3) what new factors he took into account in calculating the additional special payment allocated to the Metropolitan Police for 1999–2000 compared with 1998–99. [75754]

Mr. Boateng: The special payment was £130 million for 1997–98, £151 million for 1998–99 and will be £176 million for 1999–2000.

The payment was set at £151 million for 1998–99 following a review by Home Office officials which was the first comprehensive attempt to cost the Metropolitan Police's national and capital city functions. The report provided a degree of transparency about the additional payment which was not previously available.

In setting the special payment for 1999–2000, factors taken into account included inflation, policing related to millennium celebrations, and the overall importance of maintaining public confidence in the policing of the capital city.

Correspondence

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reply to the letters of 3 December and 26 January, from the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed concerning a computer database for tracing stolen property. [75744]

Mr. Boateng: I am sorry for the delay and shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as quickly as possible.

Number Plates

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the auto number-plate recognition system in reducing crime. [75659]

Mr. Boateng: No systematic assessment has been made, but the technical performance of automatic number plate recognition systems is kept under review.

Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the investigation into the leak of the Macpherson report will extend to those members of Ministers' staff who are not civil servants and are not based within the Department. [75791]

Mr. Straw: The conduct of the inquiry, including the question of who should be interviewed, is a matter for the investigator to determine.

Ministerial Staff

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what guidelines are in place regarding the disciplinary action which can be taken against those members of Ministers' staff who are not civil servants and are not based within the Department, where they are found guilty of misconduct or gross misconduct; [75797]

(2) what guidelines are in place regarding access to (a) unpublished documents and (b) material with a restricted classification by members of Ministers' staff who are not civil servants and are not based within the Department. [75798]

Mr. Straw: Ministers' staff are either civil servants or paid or unpaid special advisers. Paid special advisers are civil servants, employed under individual contracts (the model of which was promulgated by the Prime Minister on 19 May 1997), and are subject to the same conditions of service and the same rules of conduct as other civil servants. Unpaid advisers are subject to the normal rules of confidentiality, as the Ministerial Code, published in July 1997, makes clear. The employment by Ministers, in their capacity as Members of Parliament, of staff to assist with constituency business, is not a matter for me.

SCOTLAND

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 14 January 1999, Official Report, column 232, if he will list the expenditure not included in his answer incurred by (a) his agencies and non-departmental public bodies and (b) the Central Office of Information for relevant work carried out for his Department. [71022]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 15 February 1999]: The information requested is not held centrally for non-departmental public bodies and could be collected only at disproportionate cost. The Central Office of Information has carried out no work for my Department in the period.

Care and Repair Grants

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish (a) a list of care and repair grants made for each local authority in Scotland and (b) how much each local authority in Scotland received for such grants per 1,000 of population, for each of the last three years. [74014]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Details of individual Care and Repair grants provided by local authorities are not held centrally. The cost of grants given to owners benefiting from the Care and Repair scheme is met from the gross capital resources available to local authorities. The Scottish Office and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have agreed that expenditure on Care and Repair should be a shared priority for central and local government. The value of works completed in 1997–98 was around £6 million, covering some 1,400 homes. Revenue funding in 1997–98 amounted to £1.2 million.

From 1 July, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

M74

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will review the proposal to change the name of the M74 motorway to the M6; and if he will make a statement. [74409]

Mr. Macdonald: The previous Government had proposed that once the Glasgow to Carlisle road was upgraded to motorway throughout, its name should change to the M6. I confirm that there is no intention to renumber the route before all the remaining sections of the all-purpose route have been upgraded. From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

University Attendance

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the proportion of school children who went on to university, broken down by residence in each Scottish parliamentary constituency, in each of the last five years. [74399]

Mrs. Liddell: Information is not available in the format requested. However, information is available on the percentage of school leavers from publicly funded secondary schools in Scotland entering a full-time course of higher education for each Local Authority area. This information is set out in the table:

Primary Education

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what the level of primary education funding was per primary school pupil in (a) cash terms and (b) 1998–99 prices in each year since 1992 in each local authority area. [74544]

Mrs. Liddell: The information is given in the tables. 1996–97 is the latest financial year for actual expenditure information is currently available. The figures, which are derived from local authority returns, do not include the cost of home-to-school transport, school meals, education authority central administration costs and loan charges.

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many primary school classes there were in Scotland in (a) 1996, (b) 1997 and (c) 1998. [74981]

Mrs. Liddell: There were 17,731 classes in publicly funded primary schools in Scotland in 1997. Of these, 13,052 were single-stage classes and 4,679 were composite classes. The information requested was not collected in 1996 and information for 1998 is not yet available.

From 1 July 1999 this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Schools Statistics

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in each local authority area were opened in each year since 1992; [74511]

(2) how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in each local authority area were closed in each year since 1992. [74555]

Mrs. Liddell: Information derived from the database of schools held by The Scottish Office to enable it to conduct the annual School Census and other surveys is given in the following tables. 1993 is the earliest year for which reliable information is available in this form. The figures represent the primary and secondary schools/departments added to or removed from the database. In a number of instances this may be for reasons other than closure, such as merger. Specific information on such circumstances is not held centrally.

Nurses

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people (a) undertook nurse training and (b) qualified as trained nurses, and how many and what percentage of qualified nurses gained employment in the NHS, in each year since 1992. [74514]

Mr. Galbraith: The available information is as follows:

	(a) Student nurse intakes	(b) Student nurse completions
1992–93	2,325	2,359
1993–94	2,377	2,295
1994–95	2,230	2,047
1995–96	2,209	1,805
1997–98	2,367	1,606

(c) Information on the percentage of qualified nurses gaining employment in the NHS is available centrally for the years 1992 to 1994 only. It is published in Table 9.16 of Scottish Health Statistics 1996, a copy of which is held in the Library of the House.

Note:

The reduction in completions results from reduced intakes during the period 1990–95, which included the introduction of P2000 courses in place of the old style '1982' courses.

From 1997–98 onwards, intakes have been informed by the annual Student Nurse Intake Plans, which assess the supply and demand of nurses. These exercises are conducted in partnership with the Management Executive, NHS Trusts, Health Boards and the Private Sector and includes all specialist areas in nursing. The model used takes account of demographic trends including the age profiles of nurses currently employed within the NHS, and the number of students which require to be trained is estimated over a 5 year cycle.

NHS Bureaucracy

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been saved from reducing bureaucracy in the NHS in Scotland since 1 May 1997; and what these savings have been spent on. [74540]

Mr. Galbraith: The estimated savings from reducing bureaucracy for 1997–98 and 1998–99 are approximately £25 million.

The savings have been generated and retained at individual Health Board level and have been re-invested in patient care in line with local priorities and needs.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Class Sizes

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by individual school and local authority, the average number of pupils per (a) primary school class, (b) primary years one, two and three class and (c) secondary school class. [74545]

Mrs. Liddell: The answer to parts (a) and (b) of the question is lengthy and I have arranged for a table giving the information requested to be placed in the Library. The information requested in part (c) of the question is not held centrally.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

NHS Staff

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) NHS administrators and managers, (b) nurses, (c) hospital doctors, (d) hospital consultants and (e) general practitioners there were in each health board area, in each year since 1992. [74512]

Mr. Galbraith: As the information requested is rather lengthy, I have arranged for copies to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Primary Care Trusts

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the cost (a) in total and (b) by health board area for the introduction of primary care trusts and local health care co-operatives. [74516]

Mr. Galbraith: The introduction of Primary Care Trusts is part of the overall reconfiguration of NHS Trusts in Scotland that is expected to yield net savings of £6 million per annum. With mergers taking place in all 12 mainland Health Board areas, the saving per Board area will be £500,000 on average.

In 1998–99, just under £1 million was made available to mainland Health Boards to support the development of Local Healthcare Co-operatives.

Individual Health Board allocations are detailed in the table.

Health board	Support for LHCCs 1998–99
Argyll and Clyde	100,000
Ayrshire and Arran	80,000
Borders	30,000
Dumfries and Galloway	70,000

Lothian	101,500
Tayside	80,000
Total	996,500

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Nursery Education

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) free nursery school places, (b) hours of free nursery schooling per child and (c) children in the nursery school age group, there are in each local authority area. [74530]

Mrs. Liddell: Information on the number of free nursery school places available in each local authority area is not held centrally. Government grant funding covers up to 412½ hours of pre-school education for each eligible child over the school year. The Government's pledge to provide a free, quality, part-time education place for every child in their pre-school year, whose parents want one, has been met in Scotland: I announced this on 4 March. The estimated number of pre-school children in each local authority area eligible for pre-school education grant in the school year 1998–99 is in the table.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Ministerial Costs

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the total cost to his Department of all Ministers at the Scottish Office for each of the years (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1997–98, (d) 1998–99 and (e) 1999–2000 broken down by (i) salaries, (ii) travel and (iii) other costs; and if he will make a statement. [74497]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 4 March 1999]: For information on 1996–97 to 1999–2000 I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 March, Official Report, column 753. Expenditure for 1995–96 is shown in the table. The table shows Ministerial pay and total non-pay expenditure for ministerial offices. This includes travel and subsistence, office services and general administration costs for both Ministers and the staff of their offices. It is not possible to disaggregate this amount into the categories requested.

	Ministerial pay	Ministerial office non-pay

Victim Support

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on Government measures for Victim Support in Scotland and its future plans for this work in Glasgow. [74884]

Mr. McLeish: Government measures for Victim Support Scotland include an increase in funding for 1999–2000 of £200,000 to £1.705 million. This is made up of £105,000 for general support and £95,000 to allow a roll-out of court-based witness support programmes beyond the current services at Ayr, Hamilton and Kirkcaldy.

Victim Support Scotland has recently completed a reorganisation of local services from 77 to 32 to coincide with local authority boundaries. The level of funding for loam services is a matter for the organisation.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

New Deal (Costs)

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total cost of implementing and running the New Deal in Scotland since January 1998. [74982]

Mr. Dewar: Expenditure to the end of January 1999 on the New Deal programmes for 18 to 24-year-olds and for those aged 25 and over was £12.97 million.

Student Finance

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate, for each of the next 10 years, the annual cost of abolishing tuition fees for Scottish students at all UK universities on (a) a cash accounting basis and (b) a resource accounting basis; and if he will make a statement. [74562]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 5 March 1999]: No separate estimates have been made for tuition fee income from students at universities as requested. The table provides estimates for fees income from Scottish higher education students at higher education institutions and further education colleges for the years 1998–99 to 2001–02 only.

Scottish and EU [1] students contribution to UK higher education institutions and further education colleges

1998–99	18
1999–2000	29
2000–01	36
2001–02	38

[1] EU students are included as they have to be treated in the same way as Scottish students

Note:
Figures are at current prices

The figures show the estimated total cash transfer from Scottish (and EU) students to institutions in each year. If this cash transfer is not made each year, that funding would have to be met from central Government current resources. The figures for annual costs would be the same on a resource accounting basis as on a cash accounting basis. The estimates assume other student support remains unchanged.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Public Appointments

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by region the number of appointments of which he has (a) made personally and (b) been consulted on; and if he will list for those appointments the political affiliations of the successful candidates. [74992]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 5 March 1999]: I have made some 550 appointments to public bodies in Scotland since May 1997 and am also consulted on an on-going basis about appointments to GB or UK bodies operating in Scotland. All appointments are made in accordance with Nolan principles involving selection on merit and independent scrutiny of candidates. Where bodies do not have purely local remits I make an effort to ensure as wide a geographical representation as possible. Candidates for public appointments are not required to state their political affiliation.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Bed Blocking

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients (a) in each health board area and (b) nationally were retained past their original discharge date in NHS beds before moving to social service beds in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will estimate the cost of the NHS of this delayed discharge. [75067]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Information to a consistent definition is not currently available. A Working Group of representatives from The Scottish Office, Health Boards, NHS Trusts and Local Authorities is developing arrangements to enable data to be recorded on a consistent basis. These arrangements will be piloted in Scotland from April 1999. Standardised information should be recorded throughout Scotland from April 2000.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Teachers (In-service Training)

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many days of in-service training are provided for (a) primary and (b) secondary school teachers in each local authority area per year. [74639]

Mrs. Liddell: Under the current Scheme of Salaries and Conditions of Service for teachers employed in education authority-controlled schools there is provision for a maximum of 5 working days out of the school year to be spent on planned activities such as in-service training. The timing and planning of such dates are drawn up by the headteacher in consultation with staff, and within guidelines provided by the local authority.

As from 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Right to Buy

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will announce the results of the public consultation on proposed changes to the Right to Buy Cost Floor Rules in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [76122]

Mr. Macdonald: We received 38 responses to the consultation paper which was issued in February 1998, the majority of which were broadly supportive of the proposals outlined in the paper. Having considered the comments received, I have today laid before Parliament a Statutory Instrument which will extend the cost floor period in Scotland from 5 to 10 years with effect from 1 April 1999. This change will protect for a longer period investment made by landlords in their housing stock.

A separate Determination will also be issued which will set out in detail how landlords should calculate the cost floor in future. This will also introduce a new threshold, which will allow landlords to include significant repairs and maintenance costs within the calculation of the cost floor. The changes will affect both local authorities and other landlords whose tenants have a Preserved Right to Buy.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 26 February 1999, Official Report, column 456, how long she spent in Zimbabwe in January 1998; and if she will list the people she met. [75763]

Clare Short: The visit took less than a day. The purpose was to meet the staff of my Department in Harare. As I stated in my answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 582, I also met the right hon. Herbert Murerwa, Zimbabwean Minister of Finance.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when the detailed country strategy paper on Zimbabwe will be published. [75764]

Clare Short: We expect to publish our Country Strategy Paper for Zimbabwe next month.

Biological Resources (Patents)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the implications for poorer countries of the patents granted within the United States on (a) quinoa, (b) the neem tree, (c) j'oublie and (d) basmati. [74847]

Clare Short: We have made no assessment of the implications for developing countries of the patents granted for quinoa, the neem tree, j'oublie and basmati by the United States.

Patents can have only national effects and as such are effective only against acts within the jurisdiction concerned, in these cases the US. They have no power elsewhere. The owner of a patent can prevent the use of the protected material by others within the state concerned, including imports based on the protected technology.

Patents can protect only new technology, not natural discoveries nor existing technology and can be challenged in the courts where they are invalid.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Integrated Transport Commission

18. Mr. Walter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will bring forward plans to implement his integrated transport policy; and if he will make a statement. [73430]

Dr. Reid: We are already implementing our integrated transport policy. We are investing an extra £1.8 billion in integrated transport, and local transport plans—the key tool for making it happen—will be in place this summer.

Council Tax

19. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect of the local government settlement for 1999–2000 on council tax levels. [73431]

Ms Armstrong: Decisions on the level of council tax are a matter for each authority. Our settlement provides that if local authorities increased their budgets in line with SSAs, council taxes would rise by 4.5 per cent. on average.

33. Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about council tax levels in 1999–2000. [73445]

Ms Armstrong: Decisions on the level of council tax are a matter for each authority.

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library a table showing for each notifiable authority in England, the band D council tax for 1999–2000; and the level of increase over 1998–99, expressed (a) in cash terms and (b) as a percentage. [75547]

Ms Armstrong: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply given to the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) on 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 733.

Electric Cars

20. Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to encourage the use of electric cars in urban areas. [73432]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Electric vehicle technology has the potential to offer significant environmental benefits, especially if used in urban areas. That is why the Government is undertaking research and development into this technology through the Foresight Vehicle programme, and providing grants to help cover the additional purchase costs of electric vehicles through the Powershift programme. The Cleaner Vehicles Task Force is also considering their longer-term role.

Professional Drivers

21. Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about managing road risk for professional drivers. [73433]

Mr. Meale: I receive representations from time to time from a number of organisations in the field of road safety including ROSPA and BRAKE, on the question of the management of occupational road risk.

Road Congestion

22. Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he last met representatives from the Automobile Association regarding his proposals to tackle road congestion. [73434]

Dr. Reid: Ministers from the Department meet representatives of the Automobile Association from time to time to discuss matters arising out of the Integrated Transport White Paper. A number of such meetings took place in October and November last year.

Single Regeneration Budget

23. Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the time scale is for consideration and implementation of regeneration schemes under the new single regeneration budget, SRB5. [73435]

Mr. Caborn: Final bids must be submitted to Regional Development Agencies (or in London, the Government Office) by 30 April. Decisions on which to support will be made in June.

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the names of those people serving as members of the local Single Regeneration Budget partnerships. [75158]

Mr. Meale: This information is not held centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if hon. Members are eligible to serve as members of local Single Regeneration Budget partnerships. [75159]

Mr. Meale: I am not aware of any rules that prevent hon. Members, other than Ministers and Parliamentary Private Secretaries, from serving as members of local Single Regeneration Budget partnerships. Ministers and Parliamentary Private Secretaries are governed by the terms of the Ministerial Code.

Community Forest Schemes

24. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to encourage companies to participate in community forest schemes; and if he will make a statement. [73436]

Mr. Meacher: This is for the Community Forest teams, who I am pleased to say are succeeding in attracting an increasing amount of support from the business community. The £7.7 million of support received in 1997–98 represented a 400 per cent. increase on the level in 1994–95.

Climate Change Programme

25. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the contribution of business to meeting the targets in the UK climate change programme. [73437]

Mr. Meacher: The climate change consultation paper which we published last October set out the options on how we might meet our climate change targets. The paper looked at the potential contribution from all sectors. The consultation has now closed and we are in the process of analysing the responses. We are aiming to publish a draft UK programme later this year.

Greater London Authority

26. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the cost of the administration of the Greater London Authority in its first year of operation. [73438]

Mr. Raynsford: No estimate has yet been made specifically for the GLA's first year of operation. As noted in "A Mayor and Assembly for London" (Cm 3897), we estimate that the annual cost of entirely new administration costs—such as for the Mayor, the Assembly, their support staff and central services—will be about £20 million.

Bus Services

27. Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he is taking to encourage the improvement of bus services. [73439]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have made an additional £150 million available to local authorities over 3 years to support rural bus services and an additional £700 million of capital resources for local transport expenditure. Our policy proposals for buses were set out in the Transport White Paper last July.

Regional Development Agencies

28. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what factors were taken into account in appointing board members to regional development agencies. [73440]

Mr. Caborn: Our primary concern in appointing the Board members for the RDAs was to choose people who would make an effective contribution and represent the interests of the region as a whole. Board members have a wide range of experience, including business, local government, rural affairs, education, trade unions and the voluntary sectors.

Housing Development

29. Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the provision for housing development in structure plans currently under review. [73441]

Mr. Raynsford: Provision for housing development in structure plans is a matter for local planning authorities in the first instance. In determining provision, they must have regard to national policies (for example, "Panning for the Communities of the Future") and Regional Planning Guidance. Assessment of plans by the Secretary of State will include, amongst other things, the extent to which the local authority has had regard to these matters.

Road Schemes

30. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on private finance initiative road schemes. [73442]

Dr. Reid: Using private finance for road construction and maintenance can offer good value for money to the taxpayer. Highway Authorities should consider what form of procurement is likely to offer best value for money after they have satisfied themselves on the transport need for a scheme.

Animal Rendering Plants

31. Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will ensure that local authorities continue to have the role of monitoring and setting environmental standards at animal rendering plants. [73443]

Mr. Meale: Animal rendering plants fall within the scope of EU directive 96/61 concerning integrated pollution prevention and control. My Department issued a third consultation paper on the implementation of this directive in December last year. Paragraph 52 of the paper specifically invited views on the proposal that animal rendering plants should be regulated by the Environment Agency rather than local authorities under the directive. The consultation period ended on 28 February. The Government will make a decision on future regulation of animal rendering plants thereafter.

Standard Spending Assessments

32. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions have taken place with the Local Government Association regarding the principles underpinning the review of SSAs. [73444]

Ms Armstrong: The principles of the review of revenue grant distribution were set out in the White Paper "Modern Local Government: In Touch with the People", which was presented to the House in July 1998. Officials from a number of Departments met representatives from local government, including the LGA, the Association for London Government and the Treasurers' Societies on 10 February to discuss the review. Further regular meetings with the LGA are planned during the course of the review.

Workplace Health and Safety

34. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to improve health and safety in the workplace. [R] [73446]

Mr. Meale: The Government are working with the Health and Safety Commission and Executive to improve health and safety in the workplace. The Health and Safety Commission will shortly be submitting a three-year strategic plan to the Government. My right hon. Friends the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for the Environment met the Commission recently to discuss the Plan. It will be published in May and copies will be placed in the House Library. The Government are providing an extra £13 million in running costs to the Commission next year, and a further £23 million and £27 million for the following two years to enable the Commission and Executive to increase their efforts still further. This signals our strong commitment to improving health and safety standards.

British Waterways

35. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how the extra resources to British Waterways are planned to be allocated. [73447]

Mr. Meale: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Naysmith).

Thames Gateway

36. Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out his priorities for road improvements and public transport improvements to achieve the regeneration potential of the Thames Gateway. [73448]

Mr. Caborn: The main public transport priority to achieve the regeneration potential of the Thames Gateway remains the construction of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link. More localised public transport projects, in association with the major developments, should bring benefits throughout the Gateway.

Key priorities for roads are improvements to the A2, providing enhanced access to Kent Thames-side, one of the two main centres for development in the Thames Gateway, and a second Swale crossing to the Isle of Sheppey.

Walking-to-school Initiative

37. Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress he has made with his walking-to-school initiative; and if he will make a statement. [73449]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We established the School Travel Advisory Group in December to identify practical action to reduce car use and improve safety on the journey to school, including ways of encouraging walking to school. Guidance for local authorities and schools is in preparation and will be published in late spring 1999.

New Deal (Motorists)

38. Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to implement the new deal for motorists. [73450]

Dr. Reid: My Department, along with other departments, is taking forward the "New deal for Motorists" in a number of ways. These include increasing funds for road maintenance on both trunk and local roads, focusing investment on making the best use of the current road system, improving road and car safety, bringing forward proposals to regulate the private security industry to control cowboy wheelclampers, encouraging alternatives to car travel so as to reduce pollution, and taking forward various initiatives such as the Vehicle Crime Reduction Action team to help deter and detect vehicle theft and fraud.

BEST Bus Pensioners

39. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made since 1 May 1997 in returning the outstanding pension money to the Bus Employees superannuation trust pension fund. [73451]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 12 January 1999, Official Report, column 167.

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if (a) the local community and (b) farmers living in the locality of the genetically modified crops that have marketing consent are required to be informed of the presence of those crops. [72173]

Mr. Meacher: Council Directive 90/220/EEC controls the deliberate release of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) in the European Community. Once a GM crop has marketing consent under the Directive, it applies across all member states and there is no automatic requirement to notify the authorities, local people or local farmers where the crop is grown or the area it covers.

Details of each marketing application, ACRE's advice and the opinion of the UK Competent Authority are contained in the statutory public register held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the sites and the area each covers which are proposed to be planted with each of the genetically modified crops that have marketing consent; and when they will be planted. [72171]

Mr. Meacher: Council Directive 90/220/EEC controls the deliberate release of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) in the European Community. Once a GM crop has marketing consent under the Directive, it applies across all member states and there is no automatic requirement to notify the authorities where the crop is grown or the area it covers. Therefore, this information is not available. However, the statutory public register held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions contains details of each marketing application, ACRE's advice and the opinion of the UK Competent Authority.

The scope of the permitted use under the marketing consent does not in every case allow these crops to be cultivated commercially in the European Community.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the genetically modified crops which have received marketing consent; and to which company each belongs. [72170]

Mr. Meacher: Council Directive 90/220/EEC controls the deliberate release of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) in the European Community. Once a GM crop has marketing consent under the Directive, it applies across all member states. The GM crops which have received marketing consent under this Directive and the companies involved are listed below.

Description of GM crop	Company	Scope of permitted use
Tobacco modified for herbicide tolerance	Societe National d'Exploitation des Tabacs et Allumettes	Cultivation in European Community and use in tobacco industry
Oilseed rape hybrid system with herbicide tolerance	Plant Genetic Systems NV	Cultivation in European Community for commercial seed production only
Soybeans modified for herbicide tolerance	Monsanto Europe	Importation and processing. Not for cultivation in European Community
Maize modified for insect resistance and herbicide tolerance	Novartis	Importation, processing and cultivation in the European Community
Red-hearted chicory modified for altered fertility	Bejo Zaden BV	Cultivation in the European Community for commercial seed production only
Maize modified for herbicide tolerance	AgrEvo France	Cultivation in European Community
Maize modified for insect resistance	Monsanto Europe	Importation, processing and cultivation in the European Community
Oilseed rape modified for herbicide tolerance	AgrEvo UK Crop Protection	Importation and processing. Not for cultivation in European Community
Maize modified for insect resistance and herbicide tolerance	Northrup King Company	Importation and processing. Not for cultivation in European Community
Carnations with modified flower colour	Florigene Europe BV	For production of cut flowers and horticulture
Carnations modified for increased Vase-life	Florigene Europe BV	For production of cut flowers and horticulture
Carnations with modified flower colour	Florigene Europe BV	For production of cut flowers and horticulture

Details of each marketing application are contained in the statutory public register held in the Department of the Environment Transport and the Regions.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the release of the genetically modified crops that have marketing consent will be recorded in the public register of GMO releases. [72172]

Mr. Meacher: The releases will not be recorded on the public register as none of the consents for marketing issued so far contains such a requirement.

Once a GM crop has marketing consent under Part C of Council Directive 90/220/EEC it applies across all member states and there is no automatic requirement to notify the authorities where the crop is grown. Therefore, this information is not available.

However, the statutory public register held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions contains details of each marketing application, ACRE's advice and the opinion of the UK Competent Authority. The register is open to public inspection.

The scope of the permitted use of GM crops which have received marketing consent under Directive 90/220/EEC does not in every case allow them to be cultivated commercially in the European Community. There will be no commercial releases of GM crops in the UK before spring 2000 at the earliest.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the creation of a stakeholders' forum with respect to genetic modification issues. [75281]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The creation of a stakeholders' forum is one of the issues covered by the review of the framework for overseeing developments in biotechnology announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office in December. No decision has yet been taken.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what progress his Department has made on a comprehensive scheme for speed cameras throughout England and Wales; and if he will make a statement; [73661]

(2) if he will estimate the potential reduction in road deaths if 7,000 speed cameras were installed in England and Wales. [73660]

Dr. Reid: The siting of speed enforcement cameras is an operational matter for chief officers of police and their local traffic authorities. My Department issues advice on the deployment of speed enforcement cameras in Circular Roads 4/90. That advice makes clear that, in order to maximise their benefit, cameras should be placed at sites with a history of speed-related accidents. Information about the number of cameras in use is not kept centrally. It is not possible, therefore, to estimate fatality reductions resulting from camera use.

Fish Processing (Waste Water Charges)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for ensuring equality of treatment (a) between British ports and (b) between British and European ports in respect of waste water charges on fish processing. [74172]

Mr. Meacher: Every part of the United Kingdom and every European Union country is equally bound by the requirements of Directives including the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive. It is for each Member state to ensure compliance with the implementation timetable for each Directive, and failures to implement are matters for the Commission to pursue. The Government expects other Member states and the Commission to fulfil these obligations.

In the United Kingdom, the private sector water and sewerage undertakers in England and Wales and the public sector water authorities in Scotland and Northern Ireland are all undertaking investment programmes in treatment works to meet the requirements of the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive, which sets deadlines phased between 1998 and 2005 depending on the size of the discharge and sensitivity of the receiving waters. The costs falling on individual customers will depend on the costs incurred in meeting treatment requirements and the way in which such costs are apportioned between customers.

The Government strongly supports investment to upgrade coastal discharges, which will make a major contribution to improving the environment.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for ensuring that waste water charges for fish market (a) merchants and (b) processors become operational at the same time and at the same amounts. [74173]

Mr. Meacher: The level of trade effluent charges depends on the volume and characteristics of the waste produced and the level of treatment. In some cases the level of treatment required is being increased under the Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive.

It is not feasible to bring every new treatment works into operation on the same date. However, the Directive sets deadlines phased between 1998 and 2005.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate how many effluent treatment plants have been built since the directive on waste water became operational in (a) Denmark, (b) Holland, (c) France, (d) Spain and (e) the United Kingdom to comply with the waste water directive; and to what extent the cost of these is charged to the fish processing industry. [74171]

Mr. Meacher: The Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive was adopted by EC Member States in May 1991. Under Article 17 of the Directive, Member States have reported on implementation programmes. A broad estimate of the number of larger plants to be built or upgraded can be obtained from the difference between the number of plants in each country which were estimated to be achieving compliance with the Directive's treatment requirements in 1992 (the baseline year used for the reports) and in 2000 (the first main deadline under Article 4 of the Directive).

Denmark estimated 75 additional effluent treatment plants would be compliant with the standards of the Directive; Holland estimated 17 fewer plants (through rationalisation of treatment systems); France estimated 560 additional plants and Spain estimated 585 additional plants. The United Kingdom estimated an additional 503 plants would be compliant for the same period.

The fish processing industry does not directly incur costs associated with the construction of effluent treatment plants. Costs to the fish processing industry, and other dischargers of trade effluent, arise from the treatment by sewerage undertakers of effluent discharged to sewers before final discharge to receiving waters. Costs levied by the sewerage undertakers are based on the volume and concentration of trade effluent.

Inland Waterways

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the effect on United Kingdom inland waterway transport tonnage of COM (98) 792. [74436]

Dr. Reid: The amended proposal for a Council Regulation on a Community fleet capacity policy to promote inland waterway transport contained in Commission document (1998) 792 does not apply to inland waterway tonnage in the United Kingdom.

Task Forces

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish a list of (1) task forces and (2) policy reviews established by his Department since May 1997 which (a) have external members recruited by way of public advertisement, and details of any person so appointed and (b) engaged in public consultation exercises, and the form that these took. [74467]

Mr. Meale: I have today placed in the Library of the House a list of the task forces and reviews established by my Department since 1 May 1997 which engaged in public consultation exercises and details of the form that these took.

My Department has no task forces or reviews which had external members recruited by way of public advertisement. Most task forces and reviews are short-term bodies established to give thorough consideration to important and difficult issues. External members are invited to sit on some reviews and task forces because they are able to contribute specific experience and expertise. In such cases, public advertising would be inappropriate and disproportionate.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects measures to be put in place to alleviate traffic problems at junction 10 of the M42 motorway. [74553]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. Brian Jenkins, dated 9 March 1999:

Glenda Jackson has asked Lawrie Haynes, the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, to reply to your recent question about when measures may be put in place to alleviate traffic problems at junction 10 of the M42 motorway. I am replying in Lawrie's absence from the office.

I understand the concern about the operation of junction 10. Traffic congestion at this large junction is a particular problem during peak periods. There are also problems with the high speed of circulating traffic on the roundabout. All this contributes to tailbacks on the M42 and A5.

The installation of the traffic lights on the northbound exit slip road some time ago has improved operation of this part of junction 10. However, congestion on the slip road is still a problem with queues extending back on to the M42. We are therefore preparing a scheme to provide a dedicated lane to connect the slip road direct to the west bound carriageway of the A5. This should greatly reduce queuing on the slip road, improve operation of the roundabout and make the junction safer.

We are also preparing a scheme to improve the merging area between the southbound entry slip road and the M42. This should improve conditions for traffic joining the motorway, reducing congestion in the merge area and make conditions safer for all drivers.

It is difficult to give firm timings for carrying out these improvements until the preparation work is further advanced but we are planning for site work to begin in early 2000.

In addition to these improvements, the Highways Agency is currently pursuing an agreement with developers who have proposals to develop the Birch Coppice site adjacent to the A5 east of junction 10. These proposals would include installing traffic signals on all arms of the roundabout at junction 10 and widening the circulating carriageway, similar to the works nearing completion at junction 9 on the M42. This would improve operation of the whole junction, reducing traffic speeds on the roundabout and making it easier and safer to use.

I anticipate that we will soon reach agreement with the developers about the extent of the improvements to junction 10. However, the site does not yet have planning permission and there is no guarantee that it will go ahead. Should it not go forward we will review the improvements needed to the junction.

I hope this is helpful.

Newbury Bypass

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to monitor the effects of the A34(T) Newbury Bypass on traffic on (a) the A36/A46 from the M4 to Southampton and (b) the A338/A346 from the M4 to Bournemouth. [74721]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None, specifically in relation to the effects of the Newbury Bypass. The Highways Agency has standing arrangements for monitoring traffic on trunk roads, including the A36/A46 route. Monitoring on the A338 and the A346 is a matter for the relevant local highway authority.

Migratory Birds

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the action his Department is taking to increase the protection of migratory birds (a) in United Kingdom and (b) internationally. [74816]

Mr. Meale: The protection of migratory birds within the European Union is covered by the EC Directive on the Conservation of Wild Birds (79/409/EEC). This Directive covers the protection, management and control of these species and lays out rules for their exploitation. It is the responsibility of the European Commission to ensure Member States comply with the Directive. The Commission has recently taken action against France for the failure of its national legislation on the hunting of migratory species to comply with the Directive.

In Great Britain, the Directive on the Conservation of Wild Birds is implemented by the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The provisions of this Act are consistent with the Directive. Northern Ireland has similar legislation.

The UK has recently ratified the Agreement on the Conservation of African-Eurasian Migratory Waterbirds. The Agreement, which covers over 170 states, requires Parties to take co-ordinated measures to maintain migratory waterbird species in a favourable conservation status or to restore them to such a status. The Agreement should help improve protection of migratory species at an international level.

Sustainable Renewal

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to respond to the Joseph Rowntree Foundation's report, Sustainable Renewal of Suburban Areas. [75172]

Mr. Meale: The Report made a range of recommendations directed at the Government, local authorities and others. Many are relevant to the Urban Task Force, to the Urban Policy White Paper due later this year, and to the Policy Action Teams established by the Social Exclusion Unit carrying forward work on the Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal, and they will be considered in those contexts.

Jubilee Line Extension

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will provide a breakdown of the accidents which have occurred to workers engaged in the construction of the Jubilee Line extension, by severity of the accident, in (a) 1996, (b) 1997, (c) 1998 and (d) 1999 to date. [75170]

Mr. Meale: The accident figures requested are set out in the table. These figures have been taken from HSEs live database and are, therefore, highly provisional and may be subject to change.

Jubilee Line Extension Project (JLEP)
Accidents to JLEP workers engaged in the construction of the Jubilee Line, reported to HE under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995 from 1 April 1996 to 3 March 1999

Year	Fatal	Major	Over 3 days
1996–97	0	48	116
1997–98	0	24	46
1998 to 3 March 1999	0	5	10
Total	0	77	172

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many accidents have occurred in the construction of the Jubilee Line extension. [75173]

Mr. Meale: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer above. HSE's live database currently does not go back before 1996–97. Any accident figures before this date could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the occasions when work has ceased on the construction of the Jubilee Line extension as a result of health and safety concerns in (a) 1996, (b) 1997 (c) 1998 and (d) 1999 to date. [75161]

Mr. Meale: The information is not available in the form requested.

Since 1996, the HSE has not served any Prohibition Notices requiring work to be stopped on the Jubilee Line Extension Project. However, during visits across the project, numerous unsafe activities or situations have been dealt with by the work being stopped at the request of the HSE Inspector. In these cases work did not re-start until the relevant contractors took appropriate action. These would not necessarily be recorded on HSE's information recording system and therefore precise numbers cannot be given.

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library the reports of the Health and Safety Executive on the health and safety of the working practices pursued in the construction of the Jubilee Line extension. [75162]

Mr. Meale: Reports, compliant with current Government guidelines on disclosure of information, will be placed in the Library shortly.

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the arrangements established to ensure the health and safety of the workers engaged in the construction of the Jubilee Line extension. [75169]

Mr. Meale: The main legal responsibility for ensuring the health and safety of the workers lies with the contractors involved in the construction of the Jubilee Line Extension. JLE, the client, also has duties to protect workers working on the project. HSE held meetings with the client prior to the project starting and subsequently frequent inspections across the Jubilee Line have been carried out by HSE inspectors and will continue until the project is completed.

Hayes Railway Station Hub

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the development of the Hayes railway station hub. [75160]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This is in the first instance a commercial matter for Railtrack. I understand that the company are currently working on proposals for a development at Hayes but that no formal application has been submitted to the local authority.

Ships (Inspections)

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many foreign ships have been inspected under port state control arrangements in United Kingdom ports; of those, how many and what proportion were detained; and what percentage of inspected ships were found to have deficiencies in each year since 1990. [74967]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of inspections and detentions, and the percentage of ships detained and with deficiencies from 1990 are given.

Port state control inspections in the UK

	Number of Inspections	Number of Detentions	Percentage detained	Percentage with deficiencies
1990	2,118	79	3.7	60.8
1991	2,500	116	4.6	65.9
1992	2,133	124	5.8	69.8
1993	2,271	174	7.7	70.7
April 1994 to March 1995	2,153	212	9.8	73.2
April 1995 to March 1996	2,098	206	9.8	70.7
April 1996 to March 1997	1,880	157	8.4	71.3
April 1997 to March 1998	1,890	179	9.5	73.4

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many professional ship surveyors and inspection staff have been employed by the Surveyor General's Organisation or Marine Safety Agency in each year since 1990. [74963]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Figures requested are given in the table below. The Marine Safety Agency merged with the Coastguard Agency to become the Maritime and Coastguard Agency on 1 April 1998.

Staff in post figures as at 1 April 1998

Freight Transport

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Strategic Rail Authority will have a duty to promote the transfer of freight from road to rail. [74850]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Subject to Parliament's consideration of the necessary legislation, the Strategic Rail Authority will have a duty to promote integrated transport and powers to promote the transfer of freight from road to rail by means of grants. One of the Strategic Rail Authority's most important tasks will be to address the needs of freight as well as passengers, and the balance between the demands of each.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Strategic Rail Authority will have (a) a duty and (b) a power to influence matters outside the rail industry but which nevertheless affect it, with particular reference to maximum lorry weights. [74831]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The Strategic Rail Authority will act as a champion for the railways, taking an overview of the industry and speaking for it, subject to Parliamentary consideration of the necessary legislation. The Strategic Rail Authority will be consulted by the Commission for Integrated Transport as part of its remit in advising the Government on lorry weights and the development of railfreight.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Strategic Rail Authority will have a duty to require a minimum percentage of train paths to be available for freight traffic. [74851]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Subject to Parliament's consideration of the necessary legislation, the Rail Regulator will remain responsible for approving track access agreements. The Strategic Rail Authority will, however, develop targets for both the passenger and the freight railway, and address the balance between the demands of passenger and freight services.

English Partnerships

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much of the indicative budgets proposed to be passed to the regional development agencies from English Partnerships for 1999–2000 and future years is not committed (a) in contractual terms and (b) in principle for each of the regional development agencies. [74901]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The indicative budgets have yet to be finalised. Based on the latest provisional budgets, the percentage not committed in contractual terms (defined in this context as projects which have reached the final internal appraisal stage within English Partnerships) is as follows:

	Percentage
North East	27
North West	1
Yorkshire and Humberside	2.5
East Midlands	12
West Midlands	51.5
Eastern	37
South West	22
South East	40

The figures are still being reviewed.

It will be for the RDAs themselves to consider how to handle in principle commitments within the overall resources available to them.

Budgets for 2000–01 and 2001–02 will be determined taking into account the RDAs' corporate plans.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much is being allocated to (a) the reclamation and development of the Greenwich site, (b) the setting up and running of databases on brown-field sites and (c) the managing of the programme of millennium villages from the funding proposed to be retained centrally by English Partnerships in 1999–2000. [75743]

Mr. Meale: The Department will make an allocation to EP for the tasks it has been agreed the Agency should undertake. It is for EP to decide how to allocate those resources in accordance with proposals presented in their corporate plan.

EP's proposed allocations for these projects for 1999–2000 are as follows:

Allocation	£ million
(a) Greenwich	18
(b) Brownfield Sites	0.5
(c) Millennium Villages	5.4

Note:
In addition to the funding at (a), EP have a separate ringfenced grant in aid budget of some £15m for the Greenwich Millennium Dome site. 1999–2000 is the final year of this three-year programme.

Planning Policy

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will offer additional guidance to local planning authorities seeking to promote re-use of buildings in their local development plans. [75500]

Mr. Raynsford: Guidance on the re-use of buildings for residential purposes will be included in the revised version of Planning Policy Guidance note 3: Housing, which will be issued for public consultation shortly.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which planning policy guidance notes issued by the Planning Inspectorate are currently being reviewed. [75502]

Mr. Raynsford: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 11 February 1999, Official Report, column 308. No Planning Policy Guidance notes are issued by the Planning Inspectorate.

Monarch Butterfly

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure the survival of the Monarch butterfly. [75102]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 8 March 1999]: There are no known wild populations of the Monarch butterfly in Britain. It is one of the most widely distributed butterflies in the warmer parts of the world, occurring throughout the Americas, Asia and Australasia, and is not considered to be threatened.

Asbestos

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many HSE inspectors by region are (a) qualified and (b) available to police the new regulations and codes of practice relating to the safe removal of asbestos. [74795]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 8 March 1999]: In 1999–2000, HSE's Field Operations Directorate plans to have the full-time equivalent of 530 fully trained inspectors in operational groups; just over 500 are currently in post. Their regional distribution is shown in the following table.

Inspector years

Region	Current number of qualified inspectors in operational groups	Planned allocation of all operational inspections (including) trainees) for 1999–2000	Planned allocation of qualified operational inspectors for 1999–2000
Scotland	52	63	53
North West	68	79	69
Yorkshire and North East	67	83	72
Midlands	67	86	76
Wales and West	93	107	96
London and South East	74	93	80

All trained inspectors are able to deal with asbestos removal work which they encounter in the course of their work. They are familiar with the legal requirements, the hazard and the risk and can call on other colleagues in Regional Specialist Groups for assistance and support as necessary.

In practice, however, the majority of asbestos removal work is carried out in specific types of premises eg those owned or controlled by local authorities, the health service and construction, particularly demolition sites.

116 operational inspectors are allocated to the construction sector. Construction inspectors develop their knowledge and skills by attending a specific Asbestos Removal training course. Some of these inspectors are given additional training and assessment, including health surveillance, so that they can undertake higher-level inspection work inside asbestos removal enclosures.

Currently, some 50 inspectors are trained to this higher level; most regions have 7, one has 8 in post. This number may fluctuate depending on staff movement.

EC Environmental Councils

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish agendas for the forthcoming EC environmental councils on (a) 11 to 12 March and (b) 24 to 25 June. [75194]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The following is the agenda for the Environment Council 11 March:

EC Transport Councils

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish agendas for the forthcoming EC transport councils on (a) 29 March and (b) 17 to 18 June. [75195]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 8 March 1999]: At the Transport Council to be held on 29 March, the following topics are on the agenda: development of the Community's railways; combined transport; working time in road transport; operation of 15 metre buses; modernisation of the Warsaw system for airline liability; intermodal terminals; and satellite navigation systems. The agenda for the 17–18 June Transport Council will be known nearer the time.

Chemical Emissions

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the procedures for monitoring the emission of dangerous chemicals into the atmosphere. [75011]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Processes with the potential to emit dangerous substances to air are regulated under Part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, under which plant operators must obtain an authorisation and use the best available techniques not entailing excessive cost (BATNEEC) to prevent, minimise or render harmless such emissions. The authorisations issued by the Environment Agency or local authorities will include appropriate monitoring requirements and the results of such monitoring will appear on the public register.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 4 March 1999, Official Report, column 838, on local authority councillors employed by grant-maintained schools, what estimate he has made of the numbers of staff likely to be so disqualified. [75746]

Ms Armstrong: We have made no estimate of the numbers of teachers who are likely to be so disqualified.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 4 March 1999, Official Report, column 838, concerning teachers employed by grant-maintained schools, what consultations his Department has undertaken on this matter; and what representations have been received. [75747]

Ms Armstrong: I have undertaken no consultation about the continuation of the well-established policy that a person is disqualified from being a councillor of an authority of which they are an employee. However, officials from the Department for Education and Employment have met interested parties to discuss a range of staffing matters, including this issue of local authority councillors employed by grant-maintained schools, in the transition to the new framework.

Black Cabs

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if currently licensed black cabs will be permitted to operate within the current Metropolitan Police District boundaries after the establishment of the Greater London Authority. [75734]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Once the Metropolitan Police District boundary has become aligned with that of Greater London, taxis licensed by the Public Carriage Office will be able to ply for hire only within the new boundary.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning the impact of the Greater London Authority Bill's provisions for realigning the Metropolitan Police District with the Greater London administrative boundary on taxi cabs licensed to operate in outer London. [75735]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have received representations from London suburban-licensed taxi drivers concerned about the implications of the boundary change for their customary operations, from local authorities seeking guidance on their new licensing responsibilities, and from applicants to the Public Carriage Office for suburban London taxi driver licences concerned about the processing of their applications whilst the Public Carriage Office reviewed the suburban licensing sectors in the light of the boundary change.

Driving Test Centre, Crosby

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what dates staff at Crosby Driving Test Centre were transferred temporarily to other locations after its closure; on what date such transfers were made permanent; and to what date the transfers were backdated. [74072]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The driving examiner staff at Crosby transferred to other test centres from 6 April 1998, when the Crosby centre was closed. Formal transfer letters were given during May 1998, advising that these transfers would be permanent. Transfers were dated from 6 April so that staff would receive appropriate allowances. This did not preclude the possibility of the staff being moved back to a centre in Crosby had the Driving Standards Agency opened a replacement centre there.

Countryside Agency

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the appointment of the Chairman of the new Countryside Agency will be announced. [75198]

Mr. Meacher: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made to the House on 8 March 1999, Official Report, columns 21–33, when I announced that Ewen Cameron would be appointed as the first Chairman of the Countryside Agency. I also announced that Pamela Warhurst would be appointed as Deputy Chair.

Coalfields Portfolio

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much he expects each English region to receive from the coalfields portfolio in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) future years; and who will be taking the decision on these allocations. [75738]

Mr. Meale: Some £195 million is planned to be spent on the coalfields portfolio over the next three years.

The regional allocation of the coalfields portfolio programme for 1999–2000 is expected to be as follows:

	£ million
North East	11
North West	3.8
Yorkshire and Humberside	15
East Midlands	17.1
West Midlands	1.5
South East	0.9
South West	0.3

These figures have been agreed between English partnerships and the respective Regional Development Agencies. Regional allocations for future years will be determined in the same way.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much each English region received from the coalfields portfolio in each of the past five years. [75739]

Mr. Meale: The coalfields portfolio did not transfer to English Partnerships until the end of 1996–97. The following chart sets out total spend by English partnerships in the five EP regions which contain coalfields over the past two years.

	1997–98	1998–99
North East	3.2	1.7
North West	1.4	0.7
Yorkshire	6.2	12.2
East Midlands (all Midlands, 1997–98)	12.1	3.9
West Midlands	—	5.7

Note:
The expenditure includes both grant in aid and Agency-generated receipts

India (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which of his Ministers is deputising for him in respect of duties relating to the Budget Statement during his visit to India. [75544]

Mr. Prescott: My Ministerial colleagues will pursue their normal duties in relation to the Budget.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many days he spent (a) in India and (b) in the Maldives during his recent visit. [75542]

Mr. Prescott: I will spend eight days in India and three days in the Maldives during my visit.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what arrangements have been made in respect of the costs of transport for his visit (a) to India and (b) to the Maldives; and in what class he flew for each leg of the journey. [75546]

Mr. Prescott: All travel for this trip has been arranged in accordance with the Ministerial Code and long-standing Ministerial practice under this and previous administrations.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what role his Department played in setting up a satellite TV link-up from India to the United Kingdom to enable him to comment on the Budget Statement. [75545]

Mr. Prescott: None. There is no satellite TV link-up from India.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what regulations are in place to ensure that heavy goods vehicles operating in the United Kingdom from overseas meet British safety standards. [75758]

Ms Glenda Jackson: All such vehicles must comply with the standards of roadworthiness defined in the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986. Under the Road Traffic (Foreign Vehicles) Act 1972, a vehicle which fails to comply may be prohibited from continuing its journey and its driver may be liable to prosecution.

Local Rail Heads

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what (a) grants are and (b) support is available from his Department for the establishment of local rail heads by haulage companies. [75760]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Two grants are available from the Department to assist companies facing higher costs as a result of choosing to move freight by rail rather than road. Freight Facilities Grants assist with the capital costs often associated with rail movements (e.g. rail infrastructure and specialised loading/unloading equipment). Track Access Grants are paid to freight operators to help defray Railtrack charges for access to the rail network in respect of traffic which would otherwise move by road.

During the last 12 months, the availability of these grants and the greatly increased annual budget, currently standing at £40 million, has been widely advertised in both the trade and national press.

Workplace Parking Levy

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the amount which will be raised under the workplace parking levy from schools and hospitals in the Greater London Area. [75765]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. Decisions on whether to introduce a scheme and, if so, on geographical extent, levels of charge and possible exemptions, will all be matters for the Mayor.

Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has any plans to exempt new rail vehicles from the provisions of the Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998; and if he will make a statement. [76049]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998 apply to all new rail vehicles first brought into use after 31 December 1998. Operators who introduce new rail vehicles into service after this date which do not fully meet the regulations must apply to the Secretary of State for exemption.

We are expecting to receive a number of exemption applications from rail operating companies whose design of rail vehicles was well advanced prior to the new regulations coming into force. We are required to consult our statutory disabled advisers, the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee (DPTAC), in considering any such application.

The first application was received for the trams for use on Line 1 of the Midland Metro System. Exemption regulations relating to those trams have been placed before Parliament today. DPTAC recommended that the exemptions should be granted subject to certain conditions being applied to them. The exemptions are mostly of a very minor nature and have been requested for a short time only. We have accepted DPTAC's recommendations. The exemptions will not prevent disabled people from using the new system and we believe the system will make a significant contribution to improving mobility opportunities for disabled people in the area.

Spot-listed Buildings

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many buildings have been spot-listed in Greater London in the past year. [75503]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have been asked to reply.

163 buildings and structures in Greater London were spot-listed between 1 March 1998 and 28 February 1999. A further 497 were listed as a result of reviews of the Camden and Southwark lists and 101 following thematic studies of particular building types.

PRIME MINISTER

European Commissioners

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister what regulations provide for political neutrality in speeches made by European Commissioners; and if he will make a statement. [75163]

The Prime Minister: As has always been the case, Commissioners have a collective responsibility not publicly to oppose decisions made by the College of Commissioners.

Foreign Media Articles

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those members of his office involved in the drafting and distribution of articles written by him for publication by the international media. [75644]

The Prime Minister: Depending on the subject matter, various civil servants and special advisers in my office assist me in drafting articles for publication by the international media. This is a practice adopted by successive Administrations.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set out the basis for his practice of not making information available regarding meetings with private individuals or companies. [75673]

The Prime Minister: Ministers and civil servants meet many people as part of the process of policy development and analysis. All such contacts are conducted in accordance with the Ministerial Code, the Civil Service Code and Guidance for Civil Servants: Contacts with Lobbyists. Some of these discussions take place on a confidential basis, and in order to preserve confidentiality, it is not the normal practice of Governments to release details of specific meetings with private individuals or companies.

European Policy Discussions

Mr. Howard: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions and on which dates he has discussed matters of European policy with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Minister with responsibility for Europe, the right hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) in the absence of the Foreign Secretary. [75794]

The Prime Minister: I have regular meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others on a wide range of subjects, and will continue to do so. As with previous Governments, it is not my practice to provide details of confidential discussions.

Sierra Leone

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire on 3 March 1999, Official Report, columns 773–74, on the Foreign Affairs Committee's report on Sierra Leone, if he was informed by his officials of the contents of the report before 10.00 a.m. on 9 February. [75767]

The Prime Minister: As I made clear in my answer to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 23 February 1999, Official Report, column 231, in accordance with normal convention my Office received advance embargoed copies of the report from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office at approximately 08.30 hours on Tuesday 9 February, the day the report was published.

Select Committees (Leaked Documents)

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Prime Minister if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75669]

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor to the best of my knowledge have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Office. This excludes embargoed copies issued under House of Commons Standing Order 116.

WALES

Air Miles

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Air Miles have been earned by him and each of his Ministers; and how he proposes to use them. [73335]

Mr. Michael: None.

Fish and Shellfish Cultivation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what meetings have been held by officials of his Department with Mr. Richard J. Slaski, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's independent assessor on fish and shellfish cultivation; and if he will make a statement. [73607]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: None.

Mr. Slaski was appointed, by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in August 1998, as one of two Assessors for the forthcoming Review of Research and Development on Fish and Shellfish Cultivation and Health in England and Wales. He was selected from a number of candidates on the basis of his knowledge of the aquaculture industry and his experience in carrying out similar reviews for other Governments. His remit was to consult widely within the industry and academia and to produce a report that identified constraints to the further development of the industry, identified gaps in the current R&D programme and proposed priorities for R&D for the next five years. That report along with another which focuses on health matters, will form the basis for discussion as part of the Review; Welsh Office officials will be involved in those discussions.

National Assembly

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what preliminary work his Department has undertaken on the establishment of cross-cutting committees on (a) equal opportunities and (b) Europe, in the National Assembly. [73776]

Mr. Michael: The draft standing orders prepared by the Commissioners provide for Assembly committees for each of these matters. Following consultation on the Commissioners' report, I expect to make the standing orders in final form later this month.

Schizophrenia

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds in Wales have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses; and what these occupied beds represent as a percentage of (a) mental and (b) all beds in Wales. [74268]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: It is not possible to say how many current occupants of National Health Service hospital and unit beds in Wales have a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses. However, it is estimated that, in 1998, 10.2 per cent. of in-patients treated in the specialty of mental illness and 0.3 per cent. of patients treated in all specialties had a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people discharged from mental illness hospitals in Wales in the last year after a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses, having been proved vulnerable boarders subsequently became voluntary boarders; [74273]

(2) how many patients with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses were discharged from mental illness hospitals in Wales in the last year; and how many were admitted for a hospital stay more than once during the year. [74390]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: In 1998 there were 1,713 deaths and discharges from Welsh NHS trusts where the patient had a main diagnosis of schizophrenia psychoses. It is not known centrally how many of these, having been proved vulnerable boarders, subsequently became voluntary boarders. Reliable estimates of the number of people who were admitted for a hospital stay more than once during the year are not available centrally.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Health Care (Flintshire)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent measures he has initiated to ensure enhanced health care for Flintshire people; and if he will make a statement. [74184]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The provision of health care is a high priority and I am pleased to be able to report a number of significant developments for the people of Flintshire.

The new North East Wales NHS Trust (to be established on 1 April) will integrate community health and acute services for the people of Flintshire. This will allow clinicians in both sectors to collaborate in providing a seamless service from the time a patient is referred to the time they recover. I expect this to be of particular benefit to the elderly and other vulnerable groups whose care often extends across both sectors.

The introduction of Local Health Groups (LHGs) will bring significant benefits in terms of inclusive local decision making on commissioning of health services responsive to local need, and developing the role of primary care. Flintshire LHG is on course to be operational as a sub committee of the Health Authority from 1 April.

Since May 1996, three new NHS dental practices have been opened as a direct result of grant aid, totalling £100,000, from the Welsh Office dental initiative. Grant aid is still available to assist the Health Authority to attract new dentists to 2 further areas within Flintshire.

£193k of Winter Pressure money funded a joint NHS/Social Services rapid response team covering the whole of Flintshire. Such joint working will be facilitated by the composition of LHGs and introduction of shared planning arrangements, notably Health Improvement Programmes.

Following the transfer of functions, this will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Task Forces

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of (1) task forces and (2) policy reviews established by his Department since May 1997 which (a) had external members recruited by way of public advertisement, and details of any person so appointed and (b) engaged in public consultation exercises, and the form that these took. [74460]

Mr. Michael: I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Ministerial Visits (Primary Schools)

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the primary schools in the Cardiff, South and Penarth constituency he has visited in the last four months; and what plans he has for further visits to primary schools in that constituency. [74637]

Mr. Michael: During the last four months I have visited Evenlode Primary School and Grangetown Infants School in the constituency of Cardiff, South and Penarth.

Dental Services

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for Wales by health authority (a) the number of dentists with an NHS list and (b) the average number of patients on each NHS list for each year since financial year 1995–96. [74258]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information is given in the following table.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Links Staff Newspaper

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what have been the production costs of the Links document in each year of its publication. [74633]

Mr. Michael: Production costs for Links—The Welsh Office staff newspaper:

1998–99: £31,020 to date.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) acute, (b) geriatric, (c) mental illness, (d) learning disability and (e) maternity beds there were in each health authority in Wales in each year since 1994–95. [74374]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information is given in the following table.

Nurses

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many whole-time equivalent (a) bank, (b) agency and (c) contract nurses were employed and at what cost, by each health authority in Wales in each of the last 10 years. [74375]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information requested is not collected routinely. However, a survey carried out by the Nurse Executives of NHS trusts in Wales estimated that there were 665 whole-time equivalent bank nurses and 173 whole-time equivalent agency nurses used between July 1997 and July 1998 in Wales. Information on costs is not available.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Hospitals (Service Changes)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the hospitals, by health authority region in Wales, that have consulted the local community health council on service reconfiguration in the last 10 years; and how many beds have been (a) gained and (b) lost under these reconfigurations. [74376]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: This information is not held centrally. Responsibility for consulting local Community Health Councils on substantial service changes lies with health authorities. Such proposals are only referred to my right hon. Friend for decision if, following formal public consultation, they cannot be agreed with the Community Health Council. At present, one such referral has been made and is under consideration.

Following the transfer of functions, these issues will be a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

Health Authority Appointments

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many appointments for each health authority in Wales he has (a) made personally and (b) been consulted on since 1 May 1997; and if he will list for those appointments the political affiliations of the successful candidates. [74377]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: None. The Secretary of State's predecessor made the following appointments to health authorities in Wales during 1998.

Health authorities	Appointments
Bro Taf	1 Chair and 3 non-executive member appointments
Dyfed Powys	1 Chair and 2 non-executive member appointments
Iechyd Morgannwg	1 Chair and 3 non-executive member appointments
Gwent	1 Chair and 4 non-executive member appointments
North Wales	1 Chair and 3 non-executive member appointments

Dyfed Powys Health Authority and the North Wales Health Authority are currently both carrying a non-executive director vacancy.

Of those mentioned, only one non-executive member has carried out any significant political activity in the last five years, being a Labour member of a local authority in the area of the health authority concerned.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Health Authority Budgets

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the estimated surplus or deficit of each health authority in Wales in 1998–99. [74378]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The estimated surplus/(deficit) that health authorities and their Trusts will be incurring in 1998–99 is as follows:

Health authority area	£ million
Bro Taf	(5)
Dyfed Powys	(13)
Gwent	—
Iechyd Morgannwg	1
North Wales	(1)
Wales	(18)

Note:
These forecasts are based on health bodies' best estimates of their income and expenditure position, and are subject to audit adjustment. The final position will be reported in their 1998–99 annual accounts, which will be available in audited form at the end of July 1999.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will become a matter for the National Assembly.

NHS Pay

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the average pay of chief executives of NHS trusts for each of the last 10 years; if he will list the pay of the five highest-paid chief executives of NHS trusts in Wales; what is the average pay for Grade D nurses; and which are the five NHS trusts in Wales that have the lowest pay awards for Grade D nurses. [74379]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The first NHS trust was established in Wales on 1 April 1992 and the information requested is as follows.

The average pay of Chief Executives of NHS trusts is:

1992–93	73
1993–94	64
1994–95	62
1995–96	65
1996–97	67
1997–98	72

The highest paid Chief Executives in 1997–98 received:

Glan Hafren	103
UHW	96
North Glamorgan	88
Llandough	87
Bridgend	86

The salary scale for a Grade D nurse ranges from £12,855 to £14,705. Nurses can earn more than their basic pay, due to enhancements for working nights, weekends and bank holidays.

Taking all these factors into account, the average earnings of a Grade D nurse in Great Britain averaged across all 5 incremental points are estimated at £16,400 at December 1998 rates. Information is not held centrally on pay awards for nurses on Trust terms and conditions of service.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Cancelled Operations

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library figures for (a) each health authority, (b) each region and (c) Wales as a whole, of the number of operations cancelled on the day of, or the day after, admission to a hospital, and the numbers of those patients not readmitted within a month, by quarter for the last two years. [74380]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information on the number of operations cancelled on the day of, or the day after, admission to a hospital is not collected centrally. Data are collected on the numbers of patients who were not re-admitted within a month of a cancelled operation, by NHS Trust, and these are shown in the following table.

Hospital Reviews

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list by health authority in Wales the number of hospitals whose future is currently under review. [74381]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Responsibility for reviewing and subsequently consulting upon substantial service changes lies with health authorities. Proposals to change the functions of a hospital or an individual service are referred to my right hon. Friend for decision only if, following formal public consultation, they cannot be agreed with the local community Health Council. At present, one such referral has been made and is under consideration.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate (a) the number of people in each health authority region in Wales currently waiting for an appointment with a consultant following a referral by a general practitioner and (b) the length of time which those people (i) have already waited and (ii) are expected to wait. [74382]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The numbers of people in each health authority area in Wales waiting for an appointment with a consultant at 31 December 1998, and the numbers waiting over six months, were published in the statistical release "NHS Wales Hospital Waiting Lists: December 1998" (SDR 7/99), a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. Data are not collected centrally on the expected length of wait, which will depend on individual circumstances. However, information on the routine outpatient wait for hospital consultants in Wales is published in the bulletin "Hospital Waiting Times" produced by the Welsh Health Common Services Authority, a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House as soon as possible.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each health authority region the waiting time for new entrants to the waiting list for (a) ear, nose and throat, (b) trauma and orthopaedic, (c) general surgery, (d) ophthalmology and (e) gynaecology consultants. [74383]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The waiting times for new entrants to the lists to see NHS consultants will depend on individual circumstances. The proportions of patients seen within three months and six months of referral to consultants in these specialties in Welsh hospitals during the period 1 January 1998 to 31 March 1998 were published in "The Patient's Charter NHS Wales Performance Tables 1998", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

CABINET OFFICE

GM Foods

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office by what means he proposes to quantify (a) the benefits and (b) the risks that might flow from the genetic modification of (i) crops and (ii) food. [74863]

Dr. Jack Cunningham [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The Government receive advice on these issues from their independent expert committees, including the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment and the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chevening House

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) for what purposes Chevening House has been used by Her Majesty's Government, other than for Foreign and Commonwealth Office business, since 1 May 1997; [72965]

(2) what discussions concerning genetically modified foods and crops have taken place at Chevening since 1 May 1997. [73515]

Mr. Robin Cook [holding answers 25 and 26 February 1999]: Chevening House is available to members of Her Majesty's Government, senior officials and others for meetings and entertainment, with my permission.

As far as we are aware, no discussions about genetically modified food have taken place at Chevening.

Former Yugoslavia

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the investigation of the massacres in autumn 1998 at Gornje Obrinje and Vucitrn; what estimate has been made of the number of victims; and what steps have been taken to bring the perpetrators before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. [75137]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: HMG have been informed by the Tribunal that its investigations into the massacres at Gornje Orbinje and Vucitrn are ongoing but are being seriously hampered by the lack of cooperation and access from the Yugoslav authorities. HMG continue actively to support the work of the ICTY, including financing an additional courtroom which has helped speed up trial procedures and contributing more than £1.2 million to the Tribunal's Exhumations 1998 Programme.

Common Foreign and Security Policy

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 25 February 1999, Official Report, columns 438–39, if he will place in the Library copies of the reports of the Common Foreign and Security Policy working groups since 1 May 1997. [75081]

Ms Quin: The Government are committed to ensuring more effective parliamentary scrutiny of, and greater openness in European Union business, including the European Union's Common Foreign and Security Policy. We introduced last year procedures for the parliamentary scrutiny of all Common Foreign and Security Policy Common Positions and Joint Actions, and other politically important documents. The Government do not, however, have discretion to disclose unilaterally documents which reveal the negotiating positions of individual European Union member states. They do not, therefore, propose to place the reports of Working Group discussion in the Library of the House.

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) of 25 February 1999, Official Report, columns 438–39, in what form the outcome of the deliberations of the Common Foreign and Security Policy working groups are made available to Parliament. [74569]

Ms Quin [holding answer 8 March 1999]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the right hon. Member for Penrith and the Border (Mr. Maclean) today, Official Report, column 179.

Prime Minister (Articles)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice his Department has given to the Prime Minister's Office on the (i) style, (ii) substance and (iii) target audience of articles in the Prime Minister's name to be published in foreign newspapers and journals. [75048]

Mr. Fatchett: The FCO offers the Prime Minister's Office informal advice on the style, substance, and target audience of articles in the Prime Minister's name whenever this is requested.

Taiwan

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the United States about the military threats to Taiwan by the People's Republic of China [75080]

Mr. Fatchett: Following the US Secretary of State's recent visit to Peking, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed China, including cross-straits relations with Taiwan, with Mrs. Albright on 6 March.

Croatia

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current human rights situation in Croatia. [75229]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: While improvements have been made, much remains to be done. In particular, the most recent OSCE report on Croatia has underlined a continuing lack of progress in bringing domestic legislation, eg on protection for minorities and press freedom, into line with Council of Europe and UN human rights instruments.

Among the areas which still require government attention are:

Constitutional amendments to remove the restrictions of certain rights which are currently enjoyed by citizens rather than individuals;

Restoration of certain suspended provisions contained in the 1991 Constitutional Law on Human Rights, providing for the protection of political representation and social and cultural rights of minorities (applying above all to the Serb minority following Operations Flash and Storm in 1995);

Croatia is a party to the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees but no domestic legislation has yet been introduced to implement its principles, leaving Albanian asylum-seekers from Kosovo, for example, with treatment inconsistent with these principles;

Equal application of the Law on Citizenship;

Adoption of democratic standards regarding freedom of the media, information and expression, and public service broadcasting;

Reform of electoral legislation in order to comply with the OSCE Copenhagen Document (Articles 7 and 8) and other international standards.

We and our European partners take every opportunity to remind the Croatians that fulfilment of its international obligations is a necessary precursor to a closer relationship with Europe.

Turkey

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have been held by British Embassy officials in Turkey with (a) Kurdish and (b) human rights groups; and if he will make a statement. [74871]

Ms Quin [holding answer 8 March 1999]: British Embassy officials in Ankara regularly meet representatives of Kurdish groups, including representatives of the People's Democracy Party (HADEP). Our officials are also in constant contact with representatives of various human rights organisations in Turkey, including the Human Rights Association and the Human Rights Foundation.

Human Rights

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funding was made available to his Department's Human Rights Fund in 1998; and what it will be in 1999. [75714]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: £5 million was allocated to the Human Rights Project Fund in FY 1998–99. We plan to maintain the current funding allocation in real terms for the next financial year, and will keep this funding under review to ensure that it remains at an appropriate level.

UNSCOM

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the USA about the recall of UNSCOM's Director of Operations, Colonel James Moore, to Washington. [75215]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 8 March 1999]: None.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set up an inquiry into misuse for intelligence purposes of the disarmament agency set up after the Gulf War to eliminate Iraq's chemical and biological weapons. [75214]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The UK government have repeatedly made it clear that all information exchanges between the UK and UNSCOM, and all activities by UK nationals assigned to UNSCOM, have been strictly in pursuit of UNSCOM's mandate to dismantle Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD) capability. The US has made similar statements. UNSCOM Executive Chairman Richard Butler has said that he has always insisted on all UNSCOM activity being carried out strictly in pursuit of its disarmament mandate, not to benefit any individual member state.

Uganda

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what warnings of a threat to British nationals in Uganda his Department received prior to 1 March. [75486]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 8 March 1999]: This Department has received no warnings of threats to British nationals in Uganda from Rwandan Interahamwe rebels prior to 1 March 1999. FCO travel advice of 19 February did, however, draw attention to periodic rebel activity in the Uganda/Congo/Rwanda border areas around the Kisoro district, and mentioned that, although the situation was currently peaceful, it could change quickly.

There have in the past been a number of threats to UK interests in Uganda from other sources, including the Lord's Resistance Army and the Alliance of Democratic Forces.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the reported killings of 15 Rwandan militiamen by Ugandan forces. [75770]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are aware of reports originating in Uganda of the killing of a number of Rwandan militiamen by Ugandan and Rwandan Government forces operating in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Given the difficulty in obtaining reliable information from this remote area, we are unable to confirm the reports.

A three man UK Police Team arrived in Kampala on Friday 5 March to assist the Ugandan authorities in their investigation into the murders of the four British tourists in the Bwindi National Park. We expect the Government of Uganda's follow up to this incident and the investigation to take full account of international human rights standards.

Kosovo

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the level of involvement of Islamic terrorist organisations in Kosovo. [75562]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are aware of press reporting about contacts between Islamic terrorist organisations and the Kosovo Liberation Army (UCK), but we have no evidence of systematic involvement.

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent detention of OSCE monitors in Kosovo by Serbian forces and the rules of engagement for the extraction force in such circumstances. [75796]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: OSCE verifiers were detained by Yugoslav customs authorities during 25 and 26 February. This was a breach of the agreement setting up the OSCE Kosovo Verification Mission and official protests were made by the OSCE to the FRY authorities.

The problem was resolved by peaceful negotiation. In the event of an emergency, an extraction force is available. For security reasons, the rules of engagement remain confidential.

Ireland (Treaties)

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects treaties with the Irish Government establishing (i) British-Irish Council, (ii) British-Irish Intergovernmental Conference, (iii) North/South Ministerial Council and (vi) implementation bodies to be signed. [76010]

Ms Quin: The treaties were signed on 8 March 1998 in Dublin. Copies of the Treaties are available from the vote office and have been placed in the Libraries of the Houses of Parliament. The Treaties will be published and laid in the normal way.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Sri Lanka calling for UNHCR observers to be present at the exhumations of bodies at the mass grave in Chemmani on 5 March. [75513]

Mr. Fatchett: We are deeply concerned about reports that several hundred bodies of people who "disappeared" in army custody in 1996–97 may be in a mass grave at Chemmani in Jaffna. Our High Commissioner in Colombo has pressed on numerous occasions for a prompt and thorough investigation. I raised the issue when I visited Colombo on 10 November.

While we have called for an impartial investigation, we have not specifically suggested that UNHCR observers be present. A preliminary examination was held on 5 March to establish whether the site had been tampered with. We hope that the investigation will now proceed without further delay.

South Africa

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will assess the impact on the South African elections of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's rejection of the ANC leaders' application for a group amnesty for acts committed by ANC members. [75769]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: It is not for the UK Government to assess the impact of a ruling of a constitutional body in another country, such as South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC). The TRC's ruling on the ANC leaders' application for a group amnesty is a legal matter for the applicants concerned.

Khartoum

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Sudanese Government concerning the attacks on Christian students at the University of Khartoum on 6 and 7 February. [75802]

Mr. Fatchett: We have followed up the reports that we have received of these attacks with the concerned authorities, including the University of Khartoum.

Israel

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will be supporting Israel's request to the EU for support for the desalination plant in Gaza. [75800]

Mr. Fatchett: Water is an issue to be resolved in the final status negotiations. We support the Wye Agreement which provides for the immediate resumption of final status negotiations. We also support an equitable division of water which will take into account the concerns of all parties including other countries in the region. The proposed desalination plant has to be considered in the context of the final status negotiations.

Oman (Ministerial Visit)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the visit by the Minister of State to Oman. [75773]

Mr. Fatchett: I visited Oman on 2–4 March for discussions on regional and bilateral issues with His Majesty Sultan Qaboos and senior Omani Ministers. The visit enabled me to reaffirm the importance the United Kingdom places on existing political and commercial relations with Oman, and on the security of the Gulf region as a whole. Oman is one of our oldest friends in a region of key interest to the United Kingdom. We are keen to maintain the long-standing ties which exist between our two countries.

Falklands

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department has asked the Chilean Government to state its reasons for recommending to Lan Chile that it ceases flights between Santiago and the Falklands; and what other options for air links in the region his Department has been exploring for the Falklands. [75807]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Chilean Government have stated publicly that their action with Lan Chile was in response to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's decision to issue an Authority to Proceed in respect of the Spanish extradition request for Senator Pinochet. We have made it clear that we do no believe any such measures are justified. While we hope that Lan Chile will continue to fly to the Falklands, we are considering other options with the Falkland Islands Government, including flights to other countries, improved surface travel, and the possibility of the Falkland Islands Government leasing their own aircraft.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he made to the Chilean Government when the Presidents of Argentina and Chile signed the joint declaration ratifying Chile's support for Argentina's claim of sovereignty over the Falkland Islands on 15 December. [75805]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: None. Our position on the Falkland Islands has been made clear to the Government of Chile repeatedly in recent years.

Ascension Islands

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to charge the United States for the use of the Ascension Islands. [75757]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We currently have no plans to charge the United States for the use of Ascension Island. The United States Base on Ascension is provided free from rent and charges under the terms of the Agreement between the UK and US Governments Concerning the Extension of the Bahamas Long Range Proving Ground by the Establishment of Additional Sites in Ascension Island signed in 1956, as amended.

Wideawake Airfield, which forms part of the US Base, is a vital link in the RAF airbridge to the Falkland Islands. We are currently preparing for talks with the US Government to allow the use of Wideawake by civil charter flights. If these negotiations are successful, this will improve access to both Ascension and St. Helena, some 700 miles away.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit (Wandsworth)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has had with the London

Borough of Wandsworth on the payment of housing benefit claims to residents; and if he will make a statement. [74296]

Angela Eagle: Following a large volume of complaints and work backlogs, the London Borough of Wandsworth approved new arrangements for the management of its benefits administration from 27 November 1998. The Authority has kept the Department informed of developments. Most of the problems experienced last year have been resolved and the Department has received assurances that the remaining issues are being addressed.

Pensioners (Benefits)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what information is provided by his Department's Family Revenues Survey about the proportion of pensioners aged 80 years or over living in multiple benefit unit households relative to that of all people over pensionable age. [75221]

Mr. Timms: According to the 1996–97 Family Resources Survey (GB) 21 per cent. of pensioners aged 80 years or over were living in multiple benefit unit households compared with 19 per cent. of other people over pensionable age.

Notes:

1. Estimates are subject to sampling error and to variability in non response.
2. Percentages are rounded to nearest integer.

National Insurance Contributions

Mrs. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the Social Security Advisory Committee's report and recommendations on the draft regulations to bring non-cash vouchers into line with the treatment of cash earnings for National Insurance contribution purposes; and if he will make a statement. [76089]

Mr. Timms: We have considered the Social Security Advisory Committee's report and their recommendations carefully. We are grateful to the Committee, and those interested parties who responded to the consultation exercises, for their consideration of the draft regulations and their comments on them.

We have noted the Committee's view that it is right to close any loophole which allows an employer to avoid National Insurance liability and their general support for the principle of closer alignment of tax and NICs arrangements. However, the Committee are not convinced that our proposals for non-cash vouchers meet these criteria. In particular, they suggest that we defer implementation to assess the longer term implications or, alternatively, that we increase substantially the disregard for luncheon vouchers.

We do not believe, in the light of the extensive consultation already undertaken, there would be anything to be gained by delaying the proposal beyond April 1999. It would perpetuate the unfairness of the current arrangements whereby employees who receive part of their pay in non-cash vouchers are not liable for NICs on that part, whilst other employees, who do not receive vouchers, are liable for NICs on the whole of their salary.

To increase the disregard for luncheon vouchers above the long-standing 15 pence a day level for tax would undermine the aims of closer alignment and the need to ensure fairness with those paid in cash.

In addition to these proposals, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in last year's Budget a number of changes to the structure of the National Insurance scheme. These changes will be introduced in April 1999. The employee entry fee will be abolished, so that all employees, who pay contributions, will pay £1.32 per week less NICs. This will more than offset the increase in NICs paid by most employees on luncheon vouchers, which are the most common form of non-cash voucher.

We will therefore table shortly the Social Security (Contributions) Amendment Regulations 1999. The regulations will bring non-cash vouchers into line with the treatment of cash earnings for National Insurance Contribution purposes. A copy of the Committee's report and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's reply will be published with the regulations. The regulations will come into force from 6 April 1999.

National Insurance Reductions

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate for each constituency in Staffordshire the number of people who will benefit from the reduction in national insurance scheduled for April 1999; and if he will make a statement. [75658]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available by Parliamentary constituency. However, throughout Great Britain, some 20 million people, 90 per cent. of all employees, will pay an average of nearly £70 a year less in National Insurance contributions as a result of the abolition of the employee entry fee in April 1999.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 22 February 1999, Official Report, columns 190–91, concerning nv CJD, at what level of risk it ceases to be possible to specify the statistical risk of dying from nv CJD as a result of eating beef-on-the-bone products. [73784]

Mr. Rooker: There is no scientific proof that BSE can be transmitted to man by beef, but this is seen by SEAC as the most likely explanation, and all our control measures are based on the assumption that it is. In those circumstances, before it will be possible to calculate with any degree of certainty the risk to an individual as a result of eating beef on the bone, we need the answers to a number of key scientific questions:

how much infectivity is needed to cause disease in humans;

whether repeated exposure to small amounts of infectivity over a period of time can cause disease or whether a single dose is sufficient to result in disease;

how susceptible man is to BSE compared with, for example, cattle or mice; whether there are factors such as genetic susceptibility, or the physiology of the human gut, that might affect susceptibility or incubation period in humans compared with other species.

It is clearly not possible to conduct direct experiments to test these factors. As the BSE epidemic wanes, any risk declines along with the number of infected animals, but it is not possible to specify the statistical risk for an individual of dying from nvCJD as a result of eating beef on the bone products. In such uncertain circumstances we need to be very cautious about any decision to relax public health protection in this area.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the current incidence of tuberculosis in badgers. [74689]

Mr. Rooker: We do not have information on the current incidence of TB in badgers across GB.

Badger carcases from various sources have been examined by MAFF since 1974. These include carcases from badger removal operations carried out under the interim strategy between 1982 and 1997, taken from areas of high TB incidence in cattle herds, where badgers were thought to be implicated in the spread of bovine TB to cattle. There were also carcases examined following road traffic accidents.

Summarised are the results of the badger carcases examined by the Ministry and the percentage found positive for TB following laboratory culture. As these badgers were collected from limited areas of the country they are not representative of the incidence of TB in the badger population as a whole.

MAFF is now removing badgers only in trial areas and the Independent Scientific Group overseeing the culling trial will need time to assess the results as they become available. The results will give an indication of the level of TB in badgers but initially only in those areas where the trial takes place.

The National Road Traffic Accident Survey ended in 1991. The Krebs Report recommended a limited reintroduction of the survey as it would give a good indication of the disease in the badgers sampled. We are considering how to take this forward.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about progress in the implementation of the Krebs report. [74688]

Mr. Rooker: The strategy I announced last August is designed to provide an effective science-based approach to controlling TB in cattle. It was based on the recommendations published in the Krebs Report. Progress on implementation is as follows:

to minimise the risk to humans and investigate potential links with human health. Quarterly meetings with the Department of Health and other public health interests have been established.

the development of a vaccine. The Krebs report recognised that this is possibly the best long term solution which could take 10 to 15 years. There is not necessarily any guarantee of success. However, I fully support this development and MAFF will be spending more than £1.3 million on it per year.

research initiative to improve our understanding of the disease and how it spreads. The MAFF research programme had been revised on line with Krebs' recommendations and the budget has been increased from £1.7 million to £3.1 million in 1999–2000. We will shortly announce details of the research projects being funded from 1999 for the next three years. We are looking at factors such as the diagnostic skin test, the possible use of blood tests and the reliability of laboratory culture to see if we can identify improvement in testing and diagnosis to enable us to detect the disease more quickly. In addition, we propose to introduce a new epidemiological questionnaire to gather information on a full range of factors which might affect the spread of TB. This includes wildlife, but also husbandry practices, nutrition and the local terrain and climate. The questionnaire was piloted last autumn and points arising from the pilot study are currently under consideration. It will shortly be made publicly available.

the Government should work with the farming industry to improve husbandry methods to minimise contact between cattle and badgers. We are reviewing advice provided to farmers on husbandry and disease control. The epidemiological survey referred to above will enable us to identify best husbandry practice.

a randomised culling trial designed to test the effectiveness of different strategies and to provide unambiguous evidence of the role of badgers in cattle TB. Three badger treatment strategies will be compared in 30 areas grouped into 10 triplets. The first two triplets have been identified: one in Devon/Cornwall and the other in Gloucester/Herefordshire. Badger culling has been carried out in the pro-active areas of the Devon Cornwall triplet. We had hoped to have both the Pro-active culled before the closed season, but the terrain in the Gloucestershire triplet proved to be difficult and it will not be possible to complete the pro-active cull here until after the closed season. However, additional funding has been made available and more staff are being recruited to deal with the increased workload for the coming year. The remaining triplets will be identified by the Independent Scientific Group using scientific criteria and will be located in areas of high TB risk.

Farmers

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of farmers he expects to leave agricultural production in the next five years. [74693]

Mr. Rooker: Figures on the number of farmers leaving or coming into agriculture are not available. However, the number of farmers has been declining overall by 0.5 to 1 per cent. a year. Whether there will be any significant changes in the trend may also depend on the final conclusions on reform of the CAP and the impact of any implementing provisions, on which we are consulting the industry at present.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about methods for the eradication of bovine tuberculosis. [74690]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend, the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on 4 March 1999, Official Report, column 911.

Meat (Labelling)

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the labelling of country of origin of meat sold in Britain. [74694]

Mr. Rooker: Rules on the labelling of food products are harmonised by EC legislation. Generally, the place (but not necessarily the country) of origin of any food must be given if omitting it could mislead the purchaser about the true place of origin of that food. The place of origin may be taken as the place in which the food last underwent a substantial change.

More specifically, the Beef Labelling Scheme requires that any beef labelled with country of origin information must derive from animals born, reared and slaughtered in that country. National origin labelling of beef is expected to become compulsory from the year 2000. The labels on pre-packaged poultrymeat must give an indication of its country of origin when it is imported from outside the Community and we are currently taking steps to require this information on labels, tickets or notices near where unpackaged poultry is offered for sale.

Separately, in November last year, members of the British Retail Consortium gave a voluntary undertaking not to sell imported fresh meat, processed or packaged in the UK, under a British label. This is a welcome commitment, for UK producers and consumers alike.

Food Labelling Regulations

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations he has had with local authorities about the proposed enforcement of food labelling regulations by the Food Standards Agency. [75190]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Under the Food Standards Agency food law enforcement will generally continue to be carried out at the local level. It is proposed, however, that the Agency will assume new responsibilities for monitoring and setting standards for local authority enforcement. The Government have maintained regular contact with local authorities over all enforcement matters, including the enforcement of labelling regulations and the future responsibilities of the Agency in this important area.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list which foods or food ingredients produced from genetically modified crops are available in the UK and have been labelled in accordance with the EC Novel Foods and Novel Food Ingredients Regulations. [75191]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Genetically modified (GM) tomato paste and foods containing GM soya and GM maize are currently available in the UK.

The EC Novel Foods and Novel Food Ingredients Regulation (258/97) came into force in May 1997.

Foods containing GM soya and maize, which were approved for marketing prior to this, are required to be labelled under EC Regulation 1139/98. The GM tomato paste has been clearly labelled on a voluntary basis by the manufacturer since its launch in February 1996.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in establishing a de minimis threshold for the presence of genetically modified material in food, below which labelling would not be necessary. [75103]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The European Commission has undertaken to come forward with proposals on this issue by the end of March. We will continue to press the European Commission to adhere to this timetable.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of farm animal feed presently on sale contains genetically modified material. [75107]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Farm animal feed made only from UK grown crops does not contain any genetically modified (GM) material, because none of the GM plants granted marketing consents under Council Directive 90/220 have been grown in the UK on a commercial scale. Imported materials, in particular maize, soya and their by-products, will contain a proportion of material derived from GM plants. However, in the absence of crop segregation and specific labelling requirements, it is not possible to determine the precise extent of this.

Rabies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research projects his Department has commissioned (a) to anticipate and (b) to facilitate speedy and effective implementation of the changes in rabies control he expects to follow from the report of the Advisory Group on Quarantine; if this research specifically includes critical path planning; and what are the expected times for completion of each of these projects. [74794]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The Government are considering the outcome of the consultation on the report of the Advisory Group on Quarantine (AGQ), which recommended changes to the quarantine system. A dedicated team has been established in this Department which is able to call upon the services of a wider multi-disciplinary group of experts. They will employ recognised project management techniques which will include critical path analysis. The team has received project management training.

Projects commissioned by the team to date are as follows:

A further study of the risk associated with animals imported from the USA and Canada. This is expected to be completed in April.

A proficiency test programme for laboratories carrying out blood tests. The earliest that a laboratory might be authorised would be autumn 1999.

Consideration of the efficacy and security of microchip identification. A seminar was held in the Ministry's premises at Tolworth, Surrey, on 1 February. Work on animal identification is expected to be completed in a few months.

Preparation of a list of zoonotic infections and infestations found in cats and dogs in the EU/EEA Member States and rabies free islands which are not found in the UK.

Initial design work for potential port facilities.

A programme of work to identify an ELISA test for rabies that might replace the existing virus neutralisation test.

The advice of the Advisory Committee on Dangerous Pathogens (ACDP) has been obtained on the implications of the AGQ recommendations. A workshop is planned to be held by the ACDP on 12 April to consider this matter further.

The Office International des Epizooties and the World Health Organisation have been requested to consider the designation of specified methods for a prescribed blood test(s). It is hoped that this will be concluded in May.

Furthermore, the Chief Veterinary Officer wrote to counterparts in other EU Member States in November 1998 to ask them to confirm that they would be able to provide certification of cats and dogs to the standard recommended by the AGQ. Governments of islands that it is believed could be classified as rabies free are also being contacted. The replies are being evaluated. Work is also underway on designing an appropriate form of certificate for British cats and dogs taken out of the UK with the intention of their being re-imported.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the principal project areas in which his Department commissioned research on rabies over the last 15 years; and what were the approximate costs incurred in respect of each of these projects. [74793]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Details of research on rabies between 1991 and 1999 together with the annual budget for each project is as follows:

Information on rabies research between 1984 and 1991 is not available in this format.

During the 1980's MAFF research on rabies concentrated on answering the hypothetical question "If rabies entered the UK, where did it come from and what measures were needed to be taken to control/eradicate it". Research centred upon the collection of rabies viruses from all areas of the world where rabies was endemic and the production and use of monoclonal antibodies with which these viruses could be identified.

Subsidiary work included vaccine potency testing for the European Pharmocopoeia, research in mince into the potential use of inactivated oral vaccines, and the development of a serological test to measure the neutralizing antibody levels in animal sera.

Meat Hygiene

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) of 22 February 1999, Official Report, column 184, on meat hygiene, if he will place a copy of his letter to the hon. Member for South Derbyshire in the Library. [75189]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The exercise to collate and analyse information on the level of hygiene inspection charges levied on individual meat plants in other Member States is not yet complete.

Once the exercise is complete, I will write to those hon. Members who have asked questions on this subject and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inspections have been carried out in the UK by the EU Commission's Food and Veterinary Office in each of the last 12 months as part of its enforcement of the Meat Hygiene Directive. [75192]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: In the last 12 months the European Commission's Food and Veterinary Office carried out two inspections in the UK on controls in fresh (red) meat establishments under Directive 64/433/EEC in June and September 1998.

Date-based Export Scheme

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the reasons given by fresh meat wholesalers and abattoir owners for their reluctance to apply for the date-based export scheme; and what steps he is taking to address those difficulties. [75193]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The main concerns expressed about the Date-based Export Scheme (DBES) by trade organisations representing abattoirs are the requirement to dedicate plants to export eligible animals and meat, and the availability of eligible animals. A small number of plants have, however, expressed interest.

I have placed in the Library of the House a copy of the response issued by the Department to comments made on the consultation on our implementation of the DBES, together with a summary of those comments. Our response document recognises the difficulties of complying with the DBES conditions and that the requirement for dedication is particularly onerous. However, this requirement and the rules on eligibility of animals are set down in the EC Commission Decision. I do not believe that we could have negotiated a more liberal scheme, or that Member States would be ready to consider any changes in the near future.

Cattle Health Scheme

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the future of the Cattle Health Scheme. [76120]

Mr. Rooker: During the last UK Presidency of the EU Council, agreement was reached on changes to animal health trade rules. The new rules allow the UK to apply for official freedom from enzootic bovine leukosis for Great Britain, and we intend to do so. This will benefit farmers, and will reduce public expenditure.

The Cattle Health Scheme attests herds as being individually free of enzootic bovine leukosis, so will not be needed once GB freedom is achieved. We will continue to run the Scheme for the time being and review its future in September. Officials are writing to all members of the Scheme to let them know the position.

Abattoir Inspection Charges

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the response to his Department's consultation on the proposal to charge industry for the costs of enforcing controls on specified risk material; and if he will make a statement. [76121]

Mr. Rooker: We received 26 responses to the consultation document and we have also received other correspondence relating to these proposals. Almost all argued that the proposed charges should not be levied at a time when the livestock industry is still in great financial difficulties. Some argued that the charges would discriminate against small abattoirs in rural areas.

I and my colleagues in Scotland and Wales have carefully considered these responses but concluded that, in the light of the Government's overall priorities, we should proceed as planned. I therefore yesterday laid the necessary Regulations before Parliament. A number of consultees commented that the charge should be based on throughput rather than an hourly rate. I recognise the benefits that this could bring to small, low throughput abattoirs and have therefore asked my officials to consider the feasibility of altering the basis of the SRM charge so as to lessen the severe impact on small, low throughput abattoirs. Any change would require a further consultation exercise and amending legislation.

Copies of the responses to the consultation are available for public inspection at the main MAFF library in London.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Chamber Business

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the President of the Council how much time in the last session of Parliament was devoted in the Chamber to (a) Scottish, (b) Welsh, (c) Northern Ireland, (d) European Union, (e) Commonwealth and other foreign and (f) other business. [75539]

Mrs. Beckett: Any figures given cannot be entirely objective, as it is not always clear in what category particular debates belong. Where this is unclear the figures have been included in the "other" category. Taking this into account, the figures are as follows: (a) 121 hours 50 minutes, (b) 96 hours 47 minutes, (c) 110 hours 25 minutes, (d) 124 hours 14 minutes, (e) 104 hours 16 minutes and (f) 1560 hours 4 minutes.

These figures do not take account of the occasions on which matters relating to territorial, European Union or foreign affairs were debated at the same times as matters relating to the United Kingdom as a whole. Questions relating to Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs have all been included in category (c), even though some of them may in fact have related to category (d). All time taken on the Floor of the House last Session has been included in the above figures.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he or his Ministers have received any advance copy, draft or briefing upon the contents of any report of the Culture, Media and Sport Committee prior to its due publication date and time; and if he will make a statement. [75775]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have no instances of members of select committees giving me or my Ministerial colleagues drafts of select committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge, have there been any occasions on which members of select committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Order 116.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what are the names, qualifications and experience of the members of the Board of English Heritage; and how many of them, and which, have a disability. [74557]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Commissioners of English Heritage are as listed, together with their qualifications and experience. None has divulged any information regarding disability.

Mr. Denham: Primary care group board members are required to disclose relevant interests and enter them in the Health Authority's register of interests in accordance with the Health Authority's standing orders and standing financial instructions.

Trainee Doctors (Monitoring)

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements exist for monitoring the continuing personal suitability of trainee doctors for their future rule throughout the full period of their training. [72307]

Mr. Denham: The responsibility for the health and conduct of medical students lies with the individual university medical schools and the General Medical Council has issued guidance on this topic. The GMC has a further responsibility to ensure that doctors who qualify continue to be fit to practise. Supervision of postgraduate training lies with the Specialist Training Authority of the Medical Royal Colleges and the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for General Practice.

Dental Services

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were registered with (i) NHS and (ii) other dentists in (a) 1985, (b) 1990, (c) 1995 and (d) the last year for which figures are available. [72652]

Mr. Denham: The average number of patients registered with General Dental Service (National Health Service) dentists in England for the year 1995 is 27.1 million. For the year 1998, the average is 24.1 million. The figures are averages of the end of month registration numbers. The two figures are not comparable because the registration period was changed for new registrations from September 1996.

Formal registration of patients was introduced on 1 October 1990, so figures for the years 1985 and 1990 are not available. Dentists who do not have NHS patients are not obliged to provide the Department with details of their patients and therefore we do not collect this information.

Intensive Care

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the availability of intensive care in the United Kingdom. [72664]

Mr. Denham: There are about 1,500 adult and 250 paediatric intensive-care beds in England providing one-to-one nursing for critically ill patients. The health services in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Pathology Recruitment

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures have been taken by his Department to attract graduates into careers as NHS biomedical scientists in pathology. [73101]

Mr. Denham: The Department has published a career leaflet entitled 'A career in the NHS for graduates in biomedical science', which is made available to all university and local careers offices.

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of recruitment in the NHS for biomedical scientists in pathology. [73100]

Mr. Denham: Biomedical Scientists in pathology are recruited into the National Health Service in response to local need and accurate national statistics are not held. The National Advisory Group for Scientists and Technicians has been constituted to provide a national co-ordination mechanism for local work-force planning and education commissioning for the scientific and technical staff groups. It has met once with the relevant professional bodies, including that representing Biomedical Scientists, and has established a sub-group to develop data capture methods to obtain local work-force planning information.

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the starting salary for a graduate working in the NHS as a biomedical scientist in pathology. [73099]

Mr. Denham: 'Biomedical Scientist' is another title for Medical Laboratory Scientific Officer.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead (Mr. Austin), on 16 February 1999, Official Report, columns 727–28.

Ambulance Staff

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the pay structure of ambulance staff. [73109]

Mr. Denham: We published "Agenda for Change"—our proposals for modernising the National Health Service pay system for all NHS staff—on 15 February. We are opening talks with NHS professional and staff organisations on the basis of this agenda.

Doctors' Training

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations he has had with (a) nurses and (b) other healthcare practitioners on joint training for new doctors. [73755]

Mr. Denham: Individual university medical schools determine their own undergraduate medical curricula in the light of the recommendations from the General Medical Council's Education Committee, which has the statutory responsibility to determine the extent of knowledge and skill required for the granting of primary medical qualifications in the United Kingdom. The Committee's most recent recommendations were published in the 1993 report "Tomorrow's Doctors", which pointed out that during the undergraduate years, doctors should begin to develop an understanding of the roles, skill and responsibilities of the various caring professions and a capacity for teamwork. Medical schools are currently introducing new curricula in line with the recommendations of "Tomorrow's Doctors".

Mepitel Dressings

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what studies are being undertaken to assess the efficacy and value of mepitel dressings for treating skin conditions; and when he expects to receive the results of the studies; [74450]

(2) if he will add mepitel dressings to the drug tariff to allow for prescribing in the community; [74452]

(3) what assessments his Department has undertaken of the efficacy and value of mepitel dressings in treating patients with (i) epidermolysis bullosa and (ii) other skin conditions. [74451]

Mr. Denham: Listings of appliances in Part IX of the Drug Tariff are made only in response to, and after consideration of, applications from the manufacturers. We regard all matters concerning such applications to be confidential unless the company chooses to reveal them. We would expect companies to provide any evidence needed to support their application.

Continence Services

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if the Government will respond formally to the report of the working party on the review of continence services; [74551]

(2) when he expects to receive the report of the working party on continence services; [74542]

(3) if he will publish the report of the review on continence services prior to making any decisions on its recommendations; [74541]

(4) what is the timescale for implementation of the recommendations of the review of continence services. [74543]

Mr. Hutton: The purpose of the review of continence service policy is to produce updated guidance for health authorities, primary care groups and National Health Service trusts on NHS continence services. We expect to see proposals for the guidance, including its implementation, in time for publication in spring 1999.

NHS Bureaucracy

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made against the Government's target of saving £100 million from bureaucracy in the NHS. [74739]

Mr. Denham: On 22 May 1997, we announced plans to reduce National Health Service management costs by £100 million (£84 million in England) in 1997–98 and "The new NHS" White Paper announced that, over the five years from 1997–98, £1 billion which would otherwise have been spent on management and administration would be freed up for patient care. Details of reductions achieved in 1997–98 will be published shortly.

Private Nursing Services

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when Ministers in his Department last met representatives of (a) private nursing services and (b) those responsible for private sector care and nursing homes. [74537]

Mr. Hutton: Ministers regularly meet representatives of these groups in a variety of forums to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Chemical Allergies

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into health problems (i) caused by chemical allergies and (ii) associated with the use of fire-retardant chemicals. [74959]

Ms Jowell: The Department's policy research programme and the National Health Service research and development programmes are supporting a range of research on allergies and will continue to do so. Details of these projects can be found on the National Research Register, a copy of which is available in the Library on CD-Rom. The Department undertakes reviews of the health hazards of a wide range of specific chemicals and data on the potential allergenicity of a chemical would be evaluated as part of the review.

During the inquiry by the Expert Group to Investigate Cot Death Theories (Toxic Gas Hypothesis), the Department commissioned research to a total cost of about £400,000 to investigate the hypothesis that antimony—or phosphorus—containing compounds used as fire retardants in PVC and other cot mattresses are a cause of Sudden Infant Death Syndrome. The Expert Group concluded in its Final Report, published in May 1998, that there was no reason to believe that chemicals used as fire retardants in cot mattress materials pose any health risk to infants.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people have died in each of the last five years as a result of (a) a chemical allergy and (b) an allergic reaction to fire-retardant chemicals; [74955]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of people who have (a) a chemical allergy and (b) an allergic reaction to fire-retardant chemicals. [74957]

Ms Jowell: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the annual cost to the NHS of treating chemical allergies. [74958]

Ms Jowell: Information is not available centrally on the costs to the National Health Service of individual medical conditions.

HIV

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to announce the allocations to health authorities for their (a) HIV treatment and care budgets and (b) HIV prevention work for the next financial year. [75131]

Ms Jowell: We are currently considering options on these budgets in the light both of the work undertaken by the HIV/AIDS Stocktake Group and the forthcoming HIV/AIDS Strategy. We will announce decisions on these issues shortly.

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the average pay for Grade D nurses; and if he will list the five NHS trusts that have the lowest pay for Grade D nurses for the year 1998–99. [75026]

Mr. Denham: Average earnings of grade D nurses are estimated at £16,400, as at December 1998. The minimum point of the national grade D scale is set at £12,855, however, this will rise by 12 per cent. to £14,400 from 1 April. Information on earnings for individual trusts is held centrally only for the sample of 170 trusts used in the Department of Health earnings survey.

Patient Discharges

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate (a) by health authority, (b) by region and (c) nationally the number of patients staying past their original discharge date in NHS beds before moving to social service beds; and if he will estimate the cost to the NHS of this delayed discharge. [75040]

Mr. Hutton: The specific information requested is not collected centrally. Information is collected quarterly on the total number of patients aged 75 and over ready for discharge, but still occupying an acute bed in hospital (excluding those under the care of a psychiatric consultant) because of the following principal reasons: assessment completed but awaiting local authority funding, or, care plan agreed but patient awaiting placement in a non National Health Service-funded nursing home or residential care home. This information for the quarter ending December 1998 has been placed in the Library.

Information on the cost of delayed discharges is not reported. Nor is expenditure information available in sufficient detail to be able to estimate, with any accuracy, the cost of the delayed discharge to the NHS.

Chief Executives (Pay)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average pay for chief executives of NHS trusts for each of the last 10 years; and if he will list the pay of the five highest paid chief executives of NHS trusts for the year 1998–99. [75025]

Mr. Denham: The remuneration of chief executives of National Health Service trusts in England has been separately identified in trusts' annual reports since the 1994–95 financial year. 1998–1999 information will be available this August, when trusts have published their annual reports. Information on the average pay for Chief Executives' posts for the years 1994–95 to 1997–98 is as follows.

NHS Trusts (England)—Remuneration of Chief Executives

Average remuneration

	Basic salary	Total remuneration
1994–95	60,341	65,844
1995–96	64,237	69,757
1996–97	66,918	72,417
1997–98	71,527	76,621

Notes:

1. Information relating to the remuneration of NHS Trust Chief Executives was not collected centrally before 1994–95.
2. Total Remuneration comprises: basic salary, benefits, and performance related bonuses.
3. Remuneration relates to total remuneration of all office holders during year.
4. Average values are based on the number of NHS Trusts in each year; i.e. 1994–95 419, 1995–96 433, 1996–97 429, 1997–98 425.
5. In the years 1994–95, 1995–96 and 1997–98 reported figures were identified as both "Remuneration as Director" and as "Other Remuneration". To ensure consistency these figures have been aggregated as above.
6. Information for 1998–99 will be available in August 1999.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to NHS trusts and health authorities on 29 January 1998, stating that in-year pay rises of managerial staff should not exceed 2.7 per cent. in 1998–99. On 1 February 1999, the NHS Executive Chief Executive wrote to trust chief executives indicating that "the Government does not expect to see senior managers being awarded increases out of line with the rest of the public service" in 1999–2000.

Health Authority Budgets

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the surplus or deficit of each health authority in 1998–99. [75035]

Mr. Denham: The information requested will be placed in the Library.

Service Reconfiguration

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by region the hospitals which have in the last 10 years consulted their local community health council on service reconfiguration; and how many beds have been gained or lost following each of these reconfigurations. [75037]

Mr. Denham: In line with the practice of previous administrations, this information is not collected centrally.

Registered Homes Act 1984

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will bring forward a proposal under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 to amend the Registered Homes Act 1984 as recommended by the Better Regulation Task Force in its report on long-term care. [74961]

Mr. Hutton: No. Proposals for reforming the current regulatory system for social services are contained in our White Paper "Modernising Social Services".

Telecommunications Masts

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the public health implications of the siting and use of telecommunications masts. [74973]

Ms Jowell: The expansion of the mobile phone network has been accompanied by inquiries to the Department, mainly from members of the public, about the alleged public health implications of mobile phone base stations. Representations have also been made by the mobile phone communications companies. A consultation document on "Land Use Planning and Electromagnetic Fields", was issued in December jointly with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. Responses were requested by 19 February and are currently being considered.

Digital Signals

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the non-thermal effects of digital signals. [74974]

Ms Jowell: The Government obtain advice on restricting human exposure to electromagnetic fields from the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) who have published guidelines which apply to both digital and analogue signals. For radio frequencies, these are based on well-established thermal effects. Both the NRPB and the International Commission on Non-Ionizing Radiation Protection agree that there is no clear evidence of adverse non-thermal health effects from either digital or analogue signals to which the public are normally exposed. Thus, the alleged non-thermal health effects cannot provide a basis for setting exposure restrictions, however they are the subject of current research.

Worcestershire (Grants)

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the grants to be provided by his Department to Worcestershire County Council in 1999–2000; and if he will state the amount and purpose of each grant. [75250]

Mr. Hutton: The table shows the grants being made available for Worcestershire County Council for 1999–2000.

Description	Amount
Training Support Programme (main programme)	[1]267,657
Mental Health Grant (core and partnership programmes)	[2]768,085
Promoting Independence: Prevention Grant	[3]183,872
Promoting Independence: Partnership Grant	[3]2,315,000
Children's Social Services Grant	[3]494,000

[1] This represents allocations of 81 per cent. of the total grant. Local Authorities, including Worcestershire, will be required to bid for the remaining 19 per cent.
[2] This represents allocations of 79 per cent. of the total grant. The remainder will be bid for and allocated later.
[3] Subject to Parliament's approval

The allocations for the following grants have not yet been determined: AIDS/HIV Support Grant, Asylum-Seekers' Special Grant and Promoting Independence: Carers' Grant. Local Authorities will also be able to bid for the Alcohol and Drug Misusers Grant.

Norvic Clinic, Norwich

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 820, on Norvic Clinic, when he expects to receive the report on the death of a patient in the clinic. [75522]

Mr. Hutton: The Coroner's Inquest into the death of a patient who died at the Norvic Clinic was opened in November 1998 and immediately adjourned pending a report by the Home Office Pathologist as to the cause of death. The Coroner's Office has not yet set a date for the Inquest to be reconvened.

Military District Hospitals

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities are (a) paid and (b) compensated by the Ministry of Defence in respect of military district hospital units at (a) Derriford, (b) Frimley and (c) Peterborough; and how much such payments were in each year for which figures are available. [75210]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 March 1999]: It is assumed the hon. Member is referring to Ministry of Defence Hospital Units (MDHUs). These are integrated into National Health Service hospitals and the Defence Medical Services provide medical, nursing and other staffing. There are no direct financial transactions between the Ministry of Defence and health authorities in respect of Ministry of Defence Hospital Units.

Those National Health Service trusts which host MDHUs are paid for the treatment of military personnel, abated to reflect the contribution of military personnel to the treatment of civilians.

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total capital expenditure for setting up military district hospital units; and from which Departmental budget this was paid. [75211]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 March 1999]: It is assumed that the question refers to Ministry of Defence Hospital Units (MDHUs).

The Ministry of Defence contributes to the capital cost of establishing MDHUs. The amount they contribute is negotiated on a scheme by scheme basis. The Ministry of Defence contributed a total of £7.2 million to the capital cost of establishing MDHUs at Plymouth Hospitals National Health Service Trust, Frimley Park Hospital NHS Trust, and Peterborough Hospitals NHS Trust. The total capital expenditure spent on setting up the MDHUs is a local matter for the NHS trusts concerned. The information is not held centrally.

NHS Pension Scheme

Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the report by the Government Actuary on the investigation of the National Health Service pension scheme in England and Wales 1989 to 1994. [76011]

Mr. Denham: I have accepted the report and today placed copies in the Library.

The report concludes that it would be prudent to increase the rate of contribution required from employers to meet the scheme's future liabilities. The current rate is 4 per cent. of pensionable pay. The Government Actuary is content with our proposal that the rate should increase to 5 per cent. from 1 April 2000, with a further increase to 7 per cent. from 1 April 2001. Funding for these increases has been included in the Department's comprehensive spending review settlement.

The cost of index-linking National Health Service pensions is currently met by the Exchequer. As the report notes, I have agreed with the Chief Secretary that, in principle, the Scheme should assume its Pensions Increase liabilities from 1 April 1994 under a financial restructuring. Our officials are discussing the basis of such changes and I will inform the House when final agreement is reached. In the meantime, the Government Actuary considers that the proposed increases in employer contribution rates are consistent with the nature of the changes likely to be required under the restructuring.

Residential Allowance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to conclude his review of the Residential Allowance. [75736]

Mr. Hutton: We are examining the possible impact on costs and service patterns of transferring the Residential Allowance to local authorities, and hope to consult local government and independent providers on detailed proposals as soon as we have formed a view on that.

National Carers Strategy

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the oral statement of 8 February 1999, Official Report, column 27, concerning the national carers strategy, when the London Borough of Sutton will receive the £496,000. [75745]

Mr. Hutton: The new special grant for carers runs from 1999–2000 until 2001–02. The allocation will be paid to local authorities as part of their overall revenue allocation. Details of the allocation for 1999–2000 will be published shortly in a special grant report, which is subject to Parliamentary approval. It will show an allocation for Sutton of £71,327. This represents Sutton's share of the first year's grant of £20 million.

Long-term Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his oral statement of 1 March 1999, Official Report, columns 741–43, concerning the royal commission on long-term care, if he will set out the timetable he plans to follow for the public debate on the recommendations; and if he will make a statement. [75749]

Mr. Hutton: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State outlined in his statement to Parliament, the royal commission has produced a very detailed report, in which the commissioners themselves call for an informed debate on their recommendations. We expect that debate, which has already begun, to be an on-going one and to inform decisions we take on the commission's recommendations.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he or his Ministers have received any advance copy, draft or briefing upon the contents of any report of the Health Committee prior to its due publication date and time; and if he will make a statement. [75774]

Mr. Dobson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor to the best of my knowledge have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Order 116.

NHS Orthodontists

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average waiting time for (a) an initial appointment with and (b) treatment by an NHS orthodontist. [74906]

Mr. Denham: Most orthodontic treatment is undertaken in general dental practice and information is not held centrally on waiting times for such treatment. Provisional figures for 1997–98 show that the average waiting time in the orthodontic specialty for those treated in National Health Service hospitals in England was 72.3 days for the 2,266 elective admissions in that year. In addition, the following data was collected from NHS trusts in England for the quarter ended 31 December 1998 on the time waited for first outpatient appointments with an NHS consultant orthodontist following general practitioner written referral.

DEFENCE

Electronic Range Simulators (London)

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of electronic range simulators in London. [71662]

Mr. Doug Henderson: There are currently three electronic range simulators in Greater London; these are located in Wellington Barracks in Central London, Cavalry Barracks in Hounslow, and at RAF Uxbridge. In addition, the simulator at RAF St. Mawgan in Cornwall will move to RAF Northolt in September this year.

Defence Agencies

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are currently employed in the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency; and what the figure was at the time of its establishment. [72806]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 24 February 1999]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Brigadier P. D. Foxton to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 10 March 1999:

I refer to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the staff currently employed within the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency (ABSDA) and when the Agency was established. As Chief Executive of ABSDA I am replying as this falls within my area of responsibility.

The numbers of staff currently employed within ABSDA are 3,666 civilians and 376 military. When the Agency was established in April 1995 the figures were 5,800 civilians and 600 military.

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes he proposes in his Department's police manpower over the next five years. [73133]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 25 February 1999]: The policing needs of the Department are kept under review at all times. Certain options are currently being studied, and announcements will be made at the appropriate time. Police numbers will not, however, be reduced below the level needed to fulfil long-term commitments.

Army Technical Support Centre

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which targets the Army Technical Support Centre did not meet in 1997–98; and what monitoring he has undertaken for those targets in 1998–99. [72817]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 25 February 1999]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Army Technical Support Centre. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Brigadier A. D. Ball to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 10 March 1999:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the Key Target achievement for 1997–98 for the Army Technical Support Agency (ATSA), as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the ATSA.

As reported in the Agency's Annual Report and Accounts, ATSA did not achieve 2 out of its 9 key Targets set for 1997–98. These were:

Key Target 1: Influence equipment design by attaining an involvement of 80% of MoD(PE) ILS projects wherein ATSA's contribution is equal or greater than one half man-year of effort.

Key Target 9: Respond to 100% of Equipment Failure Reports (or equivalent) submissions within 14 calendar days of receipt.

These Key Targets were both new for that year and were untested for achievability when set. They subsequently proved unreasonable within the Agency's operating resource constraints. The Agency's actual achievement and the business impact for each target was analysed by the Agency's Owner, the Director General of Equipment Support (Army) (DGES(A)). Despite non-achievement, the customers remained satisfied with the Agency's performance in both areas over the year. Both targets were more precisely defined and agreed by the Owner and customers so as to meet more effectively their needs through the following year.

Performance against the subsequent Key Targets for 1998–99 is monitored by the Chief Executive and the Executive Management Board of the Agency on a monthly basis. This performance is reported quarterly to the Agency's Owner and annually to Ministers through publication of the Next Steps Report and the Agency's Annual Report and Accounts. Key Target achievement is also considered by the National Audit Office during the annual submission of the Accounts for external audit.

As at 26th February 1999, the Agency is on target to achieve these redefined Key Targets for 1998–99.

I hope that you find this information helpful.

Dr. Asaf Durakovic

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what plans he has to introduce testing for British Gulf War veterans using protocols recommended by Dr. Asaf Durakovic; [74716]

(2) what discussions his Department has held with Dr. Asaf Durakovic; and if he will make a statement. [74715]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Dr. Asaf Durakovic is Clinical Professor of Nuclear Medicine at Georgetown University, Washington DC. He discussed his current work in general terms with MOD officials at a meeting last month, when he explained that, in conjunction with others, he is carrying out a study into uranium levels amongst veterans of the 1990–91 Gulf conflict, in which a small number of UK Gulf veterans are participating. Our understanding is that Dr. Durakovic and his colleagues plan to publish their findings later this year: hence we look forward to seeing full details of the methodology they are using and the results obtained in due course.

MOD continues to advise UK Gulf veterans who are concerned that their health has been adversely affected by service during the Gulf conflict, including by possible exposure to depleted uranium (DU), that they are entitled to seek a referral to the Gulf veterans' Medical Assessment Programme (MAP) for a full medical assessment. Any tests which are considered clinically appropriate by the examining MAP physician, including those to detect the presence of uranium, will be arranged.

Auxiliary Oiler Contract

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if the Auxiliary Oiler contract is (a) on schedule and (b) proceeding to budget; and if he will make a statement; [75125]

(2) what (a) detailed and (b) major changes his Department has sought to make to the design of the ships under the Auxiliary Oiler contract; what was the cost to his Department of such changes and what measures have been taken to ensure that costs do not increase on the contract; and if he will make a statement; [75123]

(3) what stage the work on the Auxiliary Oiler contract has reached for (a) the first and (b) the second ship; and if he will make a statement. [75124]

Mr. Spellar: Progress continues on the design, material procurement and construction of the two ships. Construction of the central section of the first ship, comprising four major blocks, is nearing completion. For the second ship, fabrication of units for the first major block has recently started. A small number of detailed design changes have been agreed, costing the MOD around £0.5 million, mostly related to "Spend to Save" programmes to achieve reduction in through life operating costs. None of these changes affects the delivery schedule and the project remains within budget. The prime contractor is currently reviewing its overall work programme. The outcome of this review will be discussed with MOD officials shortly. It is not possible to state at this stage the extent to which this might result in delay to the deliver of the ships, although some slippage is anticipated.

Training Cycle

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) in what ways he will reduce the burden of training on individual army units in the training cycle; [75275]

(2) what plans he has to achieve a more balanced operational and training cycle for the United Kingdom's deployable divisions in the UK and in Germany. [75273]

Mr. Doug Henderson: As part of the Strategic Defence Review, we plan to introduce by 2001 a new formation readiness cycle in which each deployable brigade will carry out a three year cycle with formation-level training, commitments and other tasks. This new cycle will enable units to achieve required readiness states and to balance training requirements with operational commitments. It will be made possible by the reorganisation of army formations, including creation of a new mechanised brigade, into a more balanced force structure of two deployable divisions, one armoured and one mechanised, and will as a result help to reduce overstretch and the burden of training on individual units in the cycle.

Vectra Technologies

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what role Vectra Technologies has at the RN base Clyde; and what experience that organisation has in work on nuclear submarines. [75248]

Mr. Spellar: Vectra Technologies supply specialist safety, engineering and project management services. It is an approved Defence contractor, providing the Royal HM Naval Base Clyde with expert consultancy support in the production of safety cases for nuclear support services, in the development of nuclear safety management systems, and on management system audits.

Vectra Technologies has current experience in working for the MOD on nuclear submarines at HM Naval Base Devonport, where they have a contract for the deep cleaning of reactor compartments and for the provision of Health Physics Monitors. The company also provided Health Physics Supervisors and Monitors at the HM Naval Base Clyde between November 1992 and June 1997.

Kosovo

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further preparations are being made for a possible NATO force in Kosovo. [75693]

Mr. George Robertson: NATO remains ready to lead an international force in Kosovo to help implement an interim political agreement. Should such a force be required, it must be ready to go into Kosovo as quickly as possible after an agreement. This means that we must have forces ready in the region.

The Government announced on 22 February 1999, Official Report, column 3, the deployment of some 2,225 personnel of 4 Armoured Brigade Headquarters and the Lead Armoured Battle Group to Greece and Macedonia, and enablers for the headquarters of Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps (HQ ARRC). On 26 February, the Government announced the deployment of the majority of the remaining equipment and personnel of 4 Armoured Brigade Headquarters and the Lead Armoured Battle Group. Additional engineering and support assets are also being deployed to provide necessary engineering infrastructure support: their deployment was planned as part of the overall force, but has been brought forward to cover a longer than anticipated stay in Macedonia. NATO has now decided to deploy advance elements of the HQ ARRC to manage the build up of NATO forces in Macedonia. The UK is the framework nation for this headquarters.

Together with national support elements and the British contribution to HQ ARRC, I expect the total number of British personnel in Greece and Macedonia by mid-March to be some 4,800. This figure is consistent with the overall British contribution of some 8,000 which I announced to the House on 11 February 1999, Official Report, columns 565–66. It is a substantial number, and clearly signals our resolution to support the efforts of the international community.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department takes to ensure the compatibility of equipment held by the Falkland Islands defence force and that held by British troops stationed on the islands. [75641]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Falkland Islands Defence Force, FIDF, is raised and funded independently by the Falkland Islands Government. We encourage the FIDF to purchase compatible equipment but are not in a position to require that they do so. The compatibility of forces is fostered by combined UK/FIDF exercises.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the decision to reduce Tristar flights to the Falklands. [75640]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 120, to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle).

Royal Fleet Auxiliary

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what gapping of (a) officers and (b) other crew exists on each Royal Fleet Auxiliary vessel. [75556]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The following billets on RFA ships were gapped as at 5 March 1999.

	Gapped billets
RFA vessel	(a) Officers	(b) Other crew
Argus	—	1
Bayleaf	2	2
Fort George	—	3
Fort Grange	1	—
Oakleaf	1	—
Olna	—	2
Olwen	5	4

The total gapped billets are therefore 21. This figure is subject to change on a daily basis.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total number of deck officers employed by the Royal Fleet Auxiliary; and what is the planned complement. [75555]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The total number of seagoing Deck Officers currently employed by the Royal Fleet Auxiliary is 212. The planned seagoing complement, which includes a margin for leave and training, is 229. A further 22 Deck Officers are in complemented billets ashore.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Regional Television

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what assessment he has made of the prospects for removing regional anomalies in television coverage following the introduction of digital terrestrial television services; [75464]

(2) if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on communities receiving appropriate regional television broadcasting; [75463]

(3) what estimate he has made of the cost of (a) using digital terrestrial television transmitters to remove regional anomalies in analogue broadcasting and (b) using digital capacity to simulcast different regional variations from a single transmitter in order to remove these anomalies. [75462]

Janet Anderson: Responsibility for the delivery of analogue and digital terrestrial television (DTT) services rests with the BBC and Independent Television Commission. The ITC recently received an encouraging report of a study it commissioned into the prospects for increasing DTT coverage. The ITC will soon commence planning for the next phase of DTT transmitter in conjunction with the BBC. The prime objective of this work is further to extend DTT coverage. The Government have made it clear to the ITC and BBC that delivery of regional services is an important element to consider in development of the digital transmission network. The studies are, at this stage, designed to look at general principles and will not focus on the costs of employing digital transmissions to remove regional anomalies.

London Tourist Board

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what was the total funding his Department gave to the London Tourist Board in (a) 1995, (b) 1996, (c) 1997, and (d) 1998. [75278]

Janet Anderson: The Government do not provide funding directly to the London Tourist Board. It does, however, directly fund the English Tourist Board which has for many years provided funding to the LTB and other regional tourist boards to complement the ETB's role in delivering national and regional programmes for tourism. Also, since 1996–97, a proportion of the Government's grant-in-aid to the BTA has been earmarked to help fund the LTB's Focus London campaign, which promotes London overseas as a major tourist destination and as the gateway to Britain. The funding that the LTB has received from the ETB and the BTA is as follows:

	ETB	BTA
1995–96	791,153	—
1996–97	546,110	650,000
1997–98	489,828	923,000
1998–99	447,310	1,500,000

Airport Capacity

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions have taken place between his Department and the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions about incoming passenger and airport capacity in England. [75424]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Discussions took place at official level last year on incoming passenger forecasts. My Department's new Tourism Strategy, "Tomorrow's Tourism", makes explicit reference to the Government's work on preparing a UK airports policy looking some 30 years ahead which will reflect our policies on sustainable development and integrated transport. My Department and DETR will maintain close liaison during the preparation of this document.

Tourism Strategy

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his strategy for tourism, "Tomorrow's Tourism", what initiatives the Government are taking to widen access to tourism for the 40 per cent. of the population who do not take a long holiday. [75697]

Janet Anderson: "Tomorrow's Tourism" makes it clear that, if we are to widen access to tourism, we must first find out from those who do not take holidays what prevents them from doing so. Research into this is currently being carried out by the English Tourist Board. This will help to identify the market potential as well as any special needs which are not currently being met, and the level of training needed, to make sure that tourism businesses are able to cater for all customers.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75877]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth) on 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 195.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the President of the Council if (a) she, (b) civil servants in her Department or (c) special advisers in her Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75872]

Mrs. Beckett: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of departmental select committees giving me or the Parliamentary Secretary drafts of select committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge, have there been any occasions on which members of departmental select committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

However, as chair of the Modernisation Committee, I am responsible for drawing up its draft reports and these are also seen by my immediate advisers, that is, members of my private office and one or two officials who advise me on parliamentary matters and one of my special advisers. As a member of the House of Commons Commission, I also see some of the papers of the Domestic Committees; these are also seen by my immediate advisers.

As chair of the Cabinet Committee on future legislation, I have also been consulted about the possibility of legislation to enact the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege.

Millennium Compliance

Miss McIntosh: To ask the President of the Council when she will publish the Government's recent quarterly report on millennium computer compliance; and if she will arrange to meet transport providers to ensure that insurance cover is available for travel on 1 January 2000. [75679]

Mrs. Beckett: I will be announcing the results of the latest quarterly review shortly.

Responsibility for the transport and insurance industries rests with the Department of the Environment, Transport and Regions and Treasury respectively. I therefore have no plans to meet transport providers, nor have such providers sought a meeting.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Education Business Partnerships

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what support (a) TECs and (b) his Department give to education business partnerships; [75616]

(2) what plans he has for education business partnerships to be supported in the future by (a) TECs and (b) his Department. [75617]

Mr. Blunkett: My Department supports a range of programmes which promote education business links—principally, work experience for pupils mentoring programmes and teacher placements to industry. Support for these programmes in the year ahead, made available through Training and Enterprise Councils (TECs), will be £13.5 million. My Department also provides £145,000 support per year to the National Education Business Partnership Network.

The support that we make available to Education Business Partnerships through TECs has been an important element in the TEC Review which has been under way. I am today announcing some changes to the operation of TECs, arising from the first phase of the TEC Review. These will strengthen partnership and accountability, improve the quality of work-based training and streamline contracting arrangements.

In the light of the TEC Review, the responses we have received to the "Learning Age" Green Paper, the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC) Quinquennial Review report—which has been published today and copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses—and the setting-up of the new local learning partnerships, I propose now to undertake a wider assessment of how we can best meet the learning and skills challenge. We shall also take into account the forthcoming Moser Report on basic skills, the University for Industry Corporate Plan, the further report of the Skills Task Force and the Social Exclusion Unit report on disaffected 16 to 18-year-olds.

Drawing on the TEC Review, we will want to examine the local and national arrangements relating to the delivery of lifelong learning, work-force development and skills, excluding higher education. This will include consideration of new opportunities for business involvement in meeting the skills challenge.

I have today written inviting all those concerned with this key part of the learning and skills agenda to contribute to this process, following which I intend to publish specific proposals in the summer. I will, of course, work closely with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—as he takes forward his proposal to establish the new Small Business Service—and the Deputy Prime Minister on the role of Regional Development Agencies.

Our aim is to ensure that we have the skills required for the new century in which knowledge, application and our capacity to learn will be crucial both to individual employability and economic success. As we set out in the "Learning Age" Green Paper, our goals are to increase the number of people engaged in learning; promote excellence and quality in its delivery; ensure coherent provision of further education and work-based training; provide support for all young people in making the transition from school to further learning or employment; involve employers in the promotion of lifelong learning; ensure that provision best meets the economy's needs for skills, creativity and innovation; make the most effective use of resources; and meet our National Learning Targets.

School Transport

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will review the current statutory three-mile requirement for the provision of free school transport. [74820]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The School Travel Advisory Group, formed with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Department of Health and other interested parties, together with officials in my Department, is already considering the legislation governing home-to-school transport, including the three-mile walking distance, and will offer advice in due course.

Education Budgets

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what in the last five years for which information is available was the expenditure per pupil in full-time education in the (a) whole education budget, (b) general schools budget, (c) potential budget and (d) aggregate schools budget. [74977]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table gives, for schools in England for the financial years 1994–95 to 1998–99 inclusive, the averages of the (a) General Schools Budget, (b) Potential Schools Budget and (c) Aggregated Schools Budget, per pupil. Information on the whole education budget, per pupil, is not held centrally.

IT Initiatives

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money has been made available for information technology initiatives since May 1997 for (a) initial teacher training and (b) schools. [75021]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In respect of initial teacher training (ITT), the Teacher Training Agency has allocated just over £6 million for measures to improve the use of Information and Communications Technology (ICT) across the curriculum. This includes £1 million to support implementation of Qualified Teacher Status standards and the ITT National Curriculum for primary English and mathematics. During this period, support for £666 million of ICT-related initiatives in schools in England has been announced as part of a £1 billion programme to implement the National Grid for Learning.

Higher Education (Durham)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the amount of funding per student in higher education in Durham in the last five years. [74976]

Mr. Mudie: The following tables show, for each of the last five years, public funding per student at the University of Durham from recurrent grant from the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) and tuition fees paid from public funds.

Consistent data for the five years concerned are not available. For the years 1994–95 to 1996–97, the figures are based on data from the Higher Education Statistics Agency (HESA) and the unit of funding is in respect of full-time undergraduate and postgraduate students combined. For 1997–98 to 1998–99, the figures are based on data from the HEFCE and the unit of funding is in respect of full-time undergraduate students.

[2] Student numbers are those within the University's maximum aggregate student number (MaSN)—predominantly full-time undergraduate students

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many mature students entered higher education in Durham in each year since 1995. [74978]

Mr. Mudie: The information is given in the following table.

Mature [1] entrants to higher education courses at the University of Durham

Year	Mature entrants [2]
1995–96	1,860
1996–97	1,310
1997–98	1,470

[1] Mature students are defined as postgraduates aged 25 and over and undergraduates aged 21 and over.
[2] The numbers are census counts of enrolments, as at 1 December, onto the first year of both full-time and part-time undergraduate and postgraduate HE courses.
Note:
Provisional higher education entrant figures for 1998–99 will be available in April 1999.

Classroom Assistants

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress the Government have made against their target of (a) placing 20,000 classroom assistants in schools by 2001–02 and (b) placing 2,000 more classroom assistants in schools by April 1999. [74737]

Ms Estelle Morris: As part of the National Literacy Strategy, we have allocated £22 million to the Additional Literacy Support programme in 1999–2000. This will fund the deployment of about 2,000 full-time (or equivalent) classroom assistants. This is the first step in meeting our overall figure of an additional 20,000 full-time posts (or equivalent) by 2002. Further funding will be made available to create these additional posts in the years 2000–2001 and 2001–2002.

Local Government Expenditure (Schools)

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much of the allocation to local government in England earmarked for schools in July 1997 was received by schools. [74734]

Ms Estelle Morris: Of the unhypothecated £1,017 million education SSA increase for 1998–99, which derived from the July 1997 announcement, £916 million has been reflected in LEAs General Schools Budgets (excluding capital items and including Annual Maintenance Grant for comparability).

FE Colleges

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pay awards have been made by further education colleges for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000 in the categories (a) 0 per cent., (b) greater than 0 per cent. but less than 1 per cent., (c) greater than 1 per cent. but less than 2 per cent., (d) greater than 2 per cent. but less than 4 per cent., (e) greater than 4 per cent. but less than 6 per cent. and (f) 6 per cent. or more. [74970]

Mr. Mudie: This information is not held centrally.

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many colleges of further education are in financial health category (i) A, (ii) B and (iii) C in (a) the North West and (b) England. [74969]

Mr. Mudie: The following table shows the categories of colleges' financial health:

	North West	England
A	32 (51%)	204 (47%)
B	26 (41%)	146 (34%)
C	5 (8%)	85 (19%)
Total	63	435

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on how many occasions he has met representatives of BT to discuss internet connections to further education colleges. [75447]

Mr. Mudie: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has met the BT Chairman for discussion on a range of issues. Other Ministers have also had contact with representatives of the company. These meetings have typically covered a range of issues, rather than specifically relating to internet connections to FE colleges.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what is the average (a) capital and (b) running cost per link to the internet for further education colleges; and if he will list the range of such costs; [75444]

(2) what steps he is taking to monitor the terms under which free connections to the internet for further education colleges are being made; and if he will make a statement; [75445]

(3) (a) how many and (b) what percentage of further education colleges have been connected to the internet free of installation charge to date. [75448]

Mr. Mudie: Information relating specifically to the terms and arrangements for FE colleges access to the internet is not held centrally.

Discretionary Rate Relief

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate his Department has made of the total cost up to the end of the current financial year to schools of the removal of discretionary rate relief. [74722]

Ms Estelle Morris: None. There has been no change in the position that local authorities do not have the power to grant discretionary rate relief to schools of which they are themselves the ultimate occupier. Education authorities are responsible for ensuring that their own schools are in a position to meet their financial obligations.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of youngsters currently attending special schools will be sent to mainstream schools as a result of the Programme of Action for meeting special educational needs. [74815]

Ms Estelle Morris: We are not setting targets for the number of pupils with special educational needs that will in future be accommodated in mainstream schools. We have made it clear to local education authorities that, in line with their duties under the Education Act 1996 to arrange suitable provision for pupils with special educational needs, they should continue to give due weight to the views of parents—both where parents wish their children to attend special schools and where they wish them to attend mainstream schools. We expect that in future increasing numbers of mainstream schools will be able to offer high-quality provision to pupils with special educational needs.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many representations he has received from parents of pupils attending special schools in Essex in respect of the Programme of Action for meeting special educational needs; and how many parents supported the policy of inclusion within mainstream schools. [74813]

Ms Estelle Morris: Responses from parents both to the Green Paper "Excellence for all" and the subsequent Programme of Action were not recorded on a territorial basis.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received from Essex Local Education Authority in respect of the Programme of Action for meeting special educational needs; and what proposals he has received from Essex LEA to shut special schools. [74812]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have received no representations from Essex LEA in respect of the Programme of Action. Essex has made no formal proposal to the Department to close a special school.

Youth Community Action Plan

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his Department's policy concerning Article 1.3 of the amended proposals establishing a community action plan for youth (COM(98)695–98/0197(COD) as regards the development of a European education area; and what is his voting position thereon. [75082]

Mr. Mudie: The UK, with a number of other EU Member States, takes the view that the basis of the concept of a European education area in European Community law is doubtful. We would therefore oppose the use of this formulation on Community legislation.

Literacy Summer Schools

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many literacy summer schools have been established since 1 May 1997; how many children have attended; and what proportion of all school children they represent. [74773]

Ms Estelle Morris: Since 1 May 1997, the Government have made available funding to establish 607 literacy summer schools, catering for over 18,000 pupils. This summer, the literacy summer schools programme will run in over 900 schools with 27,000 pupils in attendance. This represents nearly 5 per cent. of the overall Year 6 cohort of pupils attending primary schools in England.

Advanced Skills Teachers

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many advanced skills teachers are currently in post. [74783]

Ms Estelle Morris: The number of teachers who had been appointed to Advanced Skills Teacher posts by 22 February 1999 was 112.

Parent Governors

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many parent governors of schools there were in each of the last 10 years. [74767]

Ms Estelle Morris: This information is not collected by the Department.

Teacher Training

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the actions he has taken to improve teacher training; indicating the cost involved; and if he will make a statement. [74784]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has set new requirements to improve initial teacher training (ITT). These represent a major step change in the expectations and requirements of new teachers and include:

(a) new high standards for the award of Qualified Teacher Status introduced for all trainees graduating from May 1998. These ensure that all new teachers have the necessary knowledge, understanding and skills to do their job effectively;

(b) national curricula in primary English and mathematics and the effective use of information and communication technology (ICT) in subject teaching for all trainees introduced from September 1998;

(c) national curricula in secondary English and mathematics and science for all phases will come into force in September 1999;

(d) an induction year was introduced by the Teaching and Higher Education 1998 Act. This will give all new teachers, from September 1999, structured support and training to consolidate and extend the skills they gained in initial training. Teachers who fall short of the standards will not be able to be confirmed as members of the profession.

The Teacher Training Agency (TTA) has been asked to support the introduction of the new requirements and has been funded to undertake a range of measures, which include:

(a) development of exemplification materials to assist in the implementation of the national curriculum for ICT in all subjects and phases, to ensure accurate assessment of trainees against the standards (including video and CD ROM formats) and the requirements in the standards concerned with teaching pupils from ethnic minority groups;

(b) assisting providers to improve the quality of their provision. The Agency is in the process of producing material to assist providers in auditing trainees' subject knowledge in English and mathematics and to improve the partnerships between higher education institutions and schools;

(c) mounting conferences for providers to brief them on the new requirements and to assist all new providers in developing course proposals;

(d) visiting all ITT providers with unsatisfactory or borderline Ofsted report grades and assists them to develop a programme for improvement;

(e) assisting in the development of trainees ICT skills through the provision of intensive two day ICT courses for all those trainees who have to follow the new curriculum need additional help.

To support the implementation of the new curriculum for the use of ICT across the curricula the TTA to date has awarded ITT providers with additional funding totalling just over £6 million. A further £1 million was awarded for the implementation of the primary English and maths curricula. Other costs of developing the national curricula and exemplification materials fall within TTA's budget and are not disaggregated.

Our Green Paper on the modernisation of the teaching profession, "Teachers: meeting the challenge of change", published in December, sets out major new proposals to strengthen teacher training further as part of modernising the profession.

We are also giving priority to skilling serving teachers and have backed this with some £500 million in the Standards Fund this year, the majority of which supports in-service training.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Sudan

8. Mr. P[illegible]r: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the programme of British assistance to Sudan. [73836]

Clare Short: We were a major donor in the 1998 crisis. There will be substantial humanitarian needs in Sudan this year and we are prepared to continue to help. The UN World Food Programme (WFP) currently holds enough food stocks until at least early summer. I am therefore authorising an initial pledge for 1999 of £4 million for humanitarian assistance which will be available to international NGOs and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). We shall monitor the situation closely in the coming months and, as needs become clearer, we shall respond further as required. We shall continue our dialogue with the UN on improving the effectiveness and efficiency of Operation Lifeline Sudan and will press for progress on the peace process which remains crucial to resolving Sudan's long term problems.

Chernobyl

10. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid her Department is currently providing to assist victims of the Chernobyl disaster. [73838]

Mr. Foulkes: We provide assistance in response to the Chernobyl disaster through the European Community and through DFID's bilateral aid programme. In total, the Government have provided over £20 million since 1997. The bulk of our support has been for the re-building of the sarcophagus, but we also give modest direct support to Chernobyl charities, especially those helping children.

Debt Relief

12. Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to promote debt relief initiatives for highly indebted poor countries; and if she will make a statement. [73842]

Clare Short: The Chancellor and I have recently proposed faster and deeper debt relief for poor countries. We are working for agreement to cancel $50 billion of debt, and for the money saved from debt repayments to be used to reduce poverty. We are contributing to the review of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative. The review is examining how the initiative needs to be redesigned, to ensure that the countries can escape from the burden of debt which prevents them from tackling poverty effectively.

Palestinian Authority

13. Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the effectiveness of aid in contributing to the development of (a) economic opportunity and (b) civil society in the Palestinian Authority. [73843]

Mr. Foulkes: Assistance from donors, including the Department for International Development, has been crucial in attempting to foster development in the West Bank and Gaza, although the weakness of the peace process and reduction in opportunities to work in Israel have led to a growth in poverty. We are working to help the Palestinian Authority to build a legal and institutional framework in which the private sector and civil society can flourish. But greater transparency and accountability are required, and economic opportunity remains constrained by severely restricted access to outside markets.

Tanzania

14. Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she held on development during her visit to Tanzania in 1998. [73844]

Clare Short: I visited Tanzania, one of the poorest countries in the world, in August 1998. I discussed a range of development issues with the President, government and opposition politicians, and private sector and civil society representatives. I outlined Britain's policy for international development, which matches closely with Tanzania's own poverty eradication strategy. We discussed the urgent need to tackle corruption and to reform the health and education sectors.

British Council

16. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she last met the chairman of the British Council to discuss collaboration on development projects. [73846]

Clare Short: I met Baroness Kennedy, the Chairperson of the British Council, on 26 January. We agreed that, although the Council and my Department have different objectives, there is room for collaboration on some activities.

Good Governance

17. Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the linkage of good Government criteria to the provision of aid by her Department. [73847]

Clare Short: Good governance, which brings effective, equitable and transparent administration and which works to secure all human rights for all, is essential for sustainable development. It is not an optional extra. We support the reduction of poverty and this includes effective and accountable government.

Kosovo and Montenegro

18. Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the current humanitarian situation in Kosovo and Montenegro; and if she will make a statement. [73848]

Clare Short: There has been a continuation of violence in Kosovo, leading to continuing displacement of civilians. In recent weeks, an estimated 9,000 people have been driven from their homes. Fighting north of Pristina has also prevented the return of 15,000 people displaced from around 17 villages.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, (UNHCR) in consultation with NGO partners, believe the number of displaced people inside Kosovo stands at about 210,000, while there are an estimated 25,000 displaced in Montenegro.

UNHCR report that assistance has continued almost uninterrupted throughout the month of February despite the violence and severe weather, and that they have succeeded in gaining access to those newly displaced, (except where fighting is actually occurring). UNHCR has coordinated and led three multi-agency convoys every day, six days per week. DFID continue to keep in close touch with the main humanitarian agencies.

Bananas (Windward Isles)

19. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the implementation of the banana recovery plan in the Windward Isles. [73849]

Clare Short: With the Department for International Development's (DFID) active support, the European Commission have committed substantial funds, including STABEX, together with a technical assistance team, to support the Windward Islands banana industry Production Recovery Plan. However, more still needs to be done by the industry—in terms of restructuring, the planning and management of production, and the implementation of the certified grower programme—in order to establish itself on a commercially viable basis. Both DFID and the Commission continue to encourage and support this essential process.

Labour Standards (Developing Countries)

20. Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the role of company codes of conduct in protecting labour standards in developing countries. [73850]

Clare Short: Codes of conduct have considerable potential as a tool for protecting labour rights in developing countries. Last year, my department produced a widely circulated report entitled "A review of UK company codes of conduct". The report contained an analysis of the content of UK company's voluntary codes and showed that codes of conduct are being used by a small, but growing, number of UK companies which source their products from overseas. The best of these codes included specific references to the International Labour Office's (ILO) core labour conventions. There is less consensus on the best means of monitoring the effectiveness of codes. We are working to find ways of implementing and monitoring codes in order to assist UK companies work with their suppliers to improve the conditions of workers in poorer countries. My Department is also supporting the Ethical Trading Initiative whose members—companies, development NGOs and Trades Unions—are piloting best practice through monitoring the ETI code of conduct.

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what support the Government are giving to initiatives to raise public awareness in developing countries on codes of conduct on labour standards. [75234]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development has supported the following initiatives to assist in raising awareness of codes of conduct on labour standards in developing countries:

The Ethical Trading Initiative (ETI) which provides practical support to efforts to develop codes of conduct and promote positive engagement between UK importers and their developing country suppliers to improve workers conditions (£530,400 over 3 years).

ETI is currently carrying out three pilot projects in the horticulture industry in Zimbabwe; the wine industry in South Africa and the clothing industry in China. The pilot projects are designed to identify ways that companies can improve labour standards amongst their suppliers by addressing the ETI code of conduct. This involves building capacity locally to ensure that there is an understanding of how the ETI code of conduct works.

ETI has also conducted a consultation exercise of developing country based NGOs for their views on codes of conduct (£25,000).

Support to a British based NGO—Women Working World wide—to carry out work in Asia (Bangladesh, Philippines, Indonesia, India and Sri Lanka) and Central America (Nicaragua, Honduras, Dominican Republic and Guatemala) to inform women workers about company's codes of conduct as a part of a workers' awareness and education campaign. (£44,000).

GDP–Aid Ratio

21. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she estimates that the internationally agreed target for a proportion of gross domestic product to be spent on humanitarian aid will be reached by the United Kingdom. [73851]

Clare Short: As we pledged, we have reversed the decline in development spending which continued throughout the life of the previous administration. The oda/GNP ratio for 1997 was 0.26 per cent. The Comprehensive Spending Review announced a significant increase of £1.6 billion in development spending which will increase the oda/GNP ratio to an estimated 0.30 per cent. by 2001. We have not set a target date for reaching 0.7 per cent.

Lomé Agreement

22. Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with EU and ACP ministers on the successor to the current Lomé agreement. [73852]

Clare Short: I met Commissioner Pinheiro and ACP and EU Ministers in Dakar on 8–9 February for the first substantive Ministerial discussion of successor arrangements to the Lomé Convention. The meeting made good progress. There was a consensus on the main objectives of the next Convention and, although the ACP were not ready to accept the inclusion of good governance as a new essential element, they agreed to work on reaching a common definition of the concept. There was a large measure of agreement on development strategies, providing support for private sector development and the need to rationalise the existing instruments and improve aid management procedures. Progress was more limited on the future of support for short term fluctuations in earnings from basic products. The EU proposed updated, more flexible and more effective arrangements for helping countries where economic and wider reforms were jeopardised from such fluctuations, but the ACP continue to favour the retention of current arrangements. I participated in the discussion on trade and economic co-operation, the area of greatest divergence between the ACP and EU positions. I put the case for alternatives to the Commission's favoured regional free trade option. This was taken up by the ACP and reflected in the final report.

St. Helena

23. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to visit the Island of St. Helena to discuss ways of improving the standard of living of islanders. [73853]

Clare Short: I have no plans to visit St. Helena. The framework for the island's development over the period 1997/98–1999/2000, and the level and scope of HMG development assistance, is set out in the Country Policy Plan agreed by HMG and the St. Helena Government in 1997. A new CPP, for the period 2000/01–2003/04, is scheduled to be agreed by the end of 1999.

Caribbean

24. Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to review the assistance programme for Caribbean states. [73854]

Clare Short: Documents outlining our strategies for the next three years will be published in the course of this year and early next year. The strategies are being prepared in consultation with a wide variety of local and other stakeholders.

Zimbabwe

25. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on aid to Zimbabwe. [73855]

Clare Short: A Country Strategy Paper for Zimbabwe will be published shortly. The strategy will focus on reducing poverty in Zimbabwe in line with the objectives of the White Paper "Eliminating World Poverty". Copies—like all our Country Strategies—will be placed in the Library of the House.

Conflict Reduction

26. Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's conflict-reduction strategy. [73856]

Clare Short: My Department's conflict reduction strategy is set out in our Policy Statement on Conflict Reduction and Humanitarian Assistance. A copy is available in the Library of the House.

Private Investment

27. Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the contribution made by private investment in supporting overseas aid projects. [73857]

Clare Short: Private investment can bring substantial economic benefits to developing countries; partnership with business can therefore support development assistance projects overseas, and help promote the achievement of the International Development Goals. We have established a new Business Partnership Unit in the Department and have instituted new arrangements to consult the private sector when drawing up our country strategies.

Humanitarian Emergencies

28. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to improve the effectiveness of its response to humanitarian emergencies; and if she will make a statement. [73858]

Clare Short: We have recently published a Policy Statement outlining our strategies for conflict reduction and humanitarian assistance. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Following a disaster, most lives are saved by immediate local effort. We are giving priority to building up the disaster response capacity of communities and institutions in disaster-prone poor countries. We also look first to agencies that are well established in the country and have the local knowledge and expertise to deliver assistance most quickly and effectively. It is important that we not only save lives and relieve suffering following a humanitarian crisis but also reduce risks and vulnerability to future crises. Therefore, we are assisting disaster-prone countries to include risk reduction, disaster management and mitigation in their development planning process and supporting community initiatives to reduce their vulnerability to risks. This includes analysing common hazards and their impact on poor people, and assessing the effect of recurrent crises on achieving the targets of sustainable international development.

Much of my Department's humanitarian response is channelled through the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement, the United Nations humanitarian agencies and non-governmental organisations. We are working closely with these agencies to strengthen international systems for dealing with humanitarian crises, particularly to improve response capacity and accountability, and the development of common standards for technical performance and reporting. We are also promoting better co-ordination within the European Union, especially through the European Community Humanitarian Office.

Debt Targets

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the target set of reducing the debts of the poorest countries by £50 billion. [73920]

Clare Short: The Government are committed to the international development targets, which include halving the proportion of people living in absolute poverty by 2015. For the poorest, most indebted countries, who are similarly committed to poverty eradication, faster and deeper debt relief is required to enable them to invest sufficient resources in poverty reduction programmes to meet these targets. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have therefore challenged the international community to increase debt relief and increase aid flows to poor countries. Our objective over the coming months is to get agreement to cancel $50 billion of debt and to increase development assistance to $60 billion by the year 2000.

Ethical Trading

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action the Government are taking to raise public awareness of ethically and fairly traded products. [75233]

Clare Short: Both I and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State have spoken at a number of public events aimed at raising awareness of ethical and fair trade. DFID also supports the Ethical Trading Initiative, whose work includes promoting positive engagement between UK importers and developing country suppliers. We are also supporting, through our development awareness funding, a range of activities which are designed to raise public awareness in this area.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if (a) she, (b) civil servants in her Department or (c) special advisers in her Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75880]

Clare Short: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of select committees giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts or select committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge have there been any occasions on which members of select committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

Colombia (Sniffer Dogs)

Mr. Alan Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with colleagues at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food regarding the immunisation of sniffer dogs sent by her Department to assist in rescue work in Colombia. [75230]

Clare Short: My Department did not send any dogs to Colombia following the recent earthquake and therefore there have been no discussions with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about immunisation.

Biotechnology Companies

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the biotechnology companies which have placed staff (a) on secondment and (b) on placement within her Department since 1 May 1997. [74843]

Clare Short [holding answer 5 March 1999]: No biotechnology companies have placed staff (a) on secondment or (b) on placement within my Department since 1 May 1997.

PHARE Programme

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she last met her colleagues from other member states of the European Union to discuss matters relating to the PHARE Programme. [73840]

Mr. Foulkes: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly meets with colleagues at the Development Council, the last of which was held on 30 November 1998. PHARE was not specifically on the agenda. She has regular informal contact with her counterparts regarding a range of issues including the PHARE programme.

PRIME MINISTER

Single Currency

Q14. Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish a White Paper setting out the constitutional, economic and political implications of the UK joining the European single currency. [73873]

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy on the single currency was set out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his statement to the House of Commons on 27 October 1997, Official Report, columns 583–88.

Secondary School Funding

Q19. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Prime Minister what is the central Government funding per pupil at secondary schools in (a) Staffordshire and (b) Hertfordshire in 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [73878]

The Prime Minister: The secondary standard spending assessment per pupil allocation for 1999–2000 is £2,759 for Staffordshire and £3,023 for Hertfordshire.

We inherited the current system for calculating Standard Spending Assessments from the previous Government. The Government will be carrying out research over the next few years as part of a review of the way different Local Education Authorities are funded.

The aim of this review will be to secure a fairer way of allocating resources from central Government to local authorities.

Engagements

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 10 March. [73871]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will have further such meetings later today.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Turkey

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited Turkey; and if he will list the people he met on his visit. [74623]

Ms Quin: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last visited Turkey on 19 May 1998. During his visit he met the President of the Turkish Republic, Mr. Suleyman Demirel, the Prime Minister, Mr. Mesut Yilmaz, the Foreign Minister, Mr. Ismail Cem, and the President of the Human Rights Association, Mr. Akin Birdal, who was recovering in hospital.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for discussions with the Turkish Government about forthcoming elections in Turkey; and if he will encourage Turkey to invite foreign election observers to witness the elections; and if he will make a statement. [74632]

Ms Quin: Our Embassy in Ankara is closely following the forthcoming elections in Turkey.

On the question of election monitoring, we encourage all OSCE (Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe) Participating States to acknowledge their standing commitment to election observation as expressed in the OSCE Copenhagen Document of 1990.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Turkey on proceedings against Abdullah Öcalan; and if he will make a statement. [74627]

Ms Quin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) on 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 797.

Dubai

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has had from the Government of Dubai to his note verbale of 10 November 1998. [74625]

Mr. Fatchett: The Government of Dubai have not replied to our Note Verbale of 10 November 1998 requesting Mr. Atkinson's release on the basis of the decision of the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention. His trial concluded on 13 December 1998 and he was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment.

European Communities Budget

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place copies of the audits of budget line A-3021 of the European Communities in the Library; and if he will list the sponsors and referees who supported the successful applicants for that budget line. [75079]

Ms Quin: The Report on Beneficiaries of Community Grants 1997 was placed in the Library last year. The 1998 Report will be placed in the Library when it is published.

Decisions on spending under this budget line are made by the Commission alone.

EU Fifth Framework Programme

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there has been a change in the view of EU partners on Israel's participation in the Fifth Framework Programme since his answer of 28 January 1999, Official Report, column 395. [75181]

Ms Quin: The UK has always supported Israel's Association with the Fifth Framework Programme in principle. It became clear recently that EU partners were also moving towards a positive view, and we were able to see this agreed at the General Affairs Council on 22 February.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the EU will decide on Israel's participation in the Fifth Framework Programme of research. [75165]

Ms Quin: The EU General Affairs Council on 22 February agreed to Israel's participation in the Fifth Framework Programme of Research.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria are used by the EU to decide on the participation of non-EU member states in the Fifth Framework Programme. [75167]

Ms Quin: There are no generalised criteria. Proposals for third country association with the Fifth Framework Programme (FP5), and for project-by-project participation by researchers from third countries, are assessed on their individual merits in the context of the EU's interests.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent (a) each of the 10 Central and Eastern European countries, (b) Cyprus, (c) Israel and (d) Switzerland meet the criteria for participation in the Fifth Framework Programme. [75166]

Ms Quin: These countries are at various stages in the process of negotiation for full participation as countries associated with the Fifth Framework Programme (FP5). There are no generalised criteria: each case is assessed on its merits in the context of the EU's interests.

Arms Sales

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries to which (a) the British Government and (b) United Kingdom companies over the last five years have sold arms, the type of weapons sold and the total value of sales. [75516]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The forthcoming Annual Report on Strategic Exports will list by country of destination the numbers of export licences issued by this Government between 2 May and 31 December 1997 in each equipment category and give details of the military equipment for which licences have been granted. It will also set out the value of defence exports to each country in 1997. This information will also be given in future reports.

As regards information on export licensing decisions taken by the previous administration, it was normal practice for such statistics to be placed periodically in the Library of the House. However, as the then Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), made clear in her answer of 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71, such information should be treated as indicative only. As regards information on actual defence exports in the last five years, I refer to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence on 31 March 1998, Official Report, columns 444–45.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the removal of the Lan Chile flight on the people of the Falklands. [75642]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Lan Chile link has commercial and social benefits to communities in both the Falklands and southern Chile. We would regret any action which penalised these communities. We have expressed our regret to the Chilean Government over their decision to ask Lan Chile to suspend flights to the Falklands and said we do not believe this to be justified. We hope that Lan Chile will continue to fly to the Falklands after 31 March.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the extent of human rights violations on vessels operating in waters around the Falklands. [75639]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Both HMG and the Falkland Islands Government (FIG) take seriously any violation of human rights on vessels fishing in Falkland Islands waters while there are clearly considerable difficulties in assessing the conditions on board such fishing vessels, every effort is made to monitor the situation. The FIG investigate all cases where complaints are made. A successful prosecution was brought against the Captain of a fishing vessel in April last year. We continue to work closely with FIG on this issue.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he plans to take if Lan Chile does not continue its flights to the Falklands after 31 March. [75888]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: While we hope that Lan Chile will continue to fly to the Falklands, we are considering other options with the Falkland Islands Government, including flights to other countries, improve surface travel, and the possibility of the Falkland Islands Government leasing their own aircraft.

EU Officials

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 20 January 1999, Official Report, column 505, concerning indicted EU officials, when the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), proposes to write to the hon. Member for Ludlow. [75723]

Ms Quin: I continue to press the European Commission for the information requested by the hon. Member for Ludlow. I will write as soon as it is received.

Foreign Media Articles

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 2 March 1999, Official Report, columns 684–85, for what reason he does not hold it to be a worthwhile use of resources to record which of the Prime Minister's articles for publication by the foreign press his Department has facilitated placing. [75549]

Mr. Fatchett: The resources available to the FCO News Department and press and public affairs sections in our overseas posts are already fully committed in support of the FCO's objectives. To maintain the records proposed by the right hon. Member would therefore require the diversion of resources from other more essential activity.

Russia

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about his visit to Murmansk. [75772]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 March 1999]: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had the opportunity, as part of his trip to Russia, to visit the Murmansk region on 3 March to see for himself the scale of one of the largest concentrations of nuclear reactors, spent fuel and waste in the world.

The sheer number of nuclear submarines awaiting decommissioning is stretching the Russian facilities to breaking point. My right hon. Friend saw for himself the "Lepse", which has been used as a storage vessel for spent nuclear fuel rods for the past twenty years and is now in a rapidly deteriorating state in Murmansk Harbour.

My right hon. Friend also met Foreign Minister Ivanov, who welcomed UK assistance in the management of Russian nuclear waste. In particular, my right hon. Friend stressed the importance we attach to Russia reaching agreement with donors on liability and taxation in the field of nuclear assistance.

Whilst at Murmansk, my right hon. Friend was pleased to be able to announce a new British programme, backed by over £3 million in additional funds, to help Russia with these problems.

We are not alone in seeking to resolve these issues. It will take a coordinated international effort and other countries are already making a contribution. The countries of Scandinavia, the United States and the European Union, amongst others, already have programmes dealing with the decommissioning of Russian nuclear submarines and the management of spent nuclear fuel and waste. We hope to work with these other countries and with Russia in building a wider international programme of assistance.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what discussions he has had with the Russian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister about Russian defence exports in Syria; [75799]

(2) if he will make a statement on his talks with the Russian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister. [75771]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 March 1999]: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met Foreign Minister Ivanov in Moscow on 4 March, and had further talks with him and Prime Minister Primakov in Sochi on 5 March. The talks covered a number of current foreign policy issues, including Iraq and Kosovo, Russia's discussion with the IMF, and human rights. The Foreign Secretary emphasised the need for rapid agreement between Russia and the IMF, which he reinforced with a personal message from the Prime Minister. On Kosovo, the Foreign Secretary welcomed Russia's continuing involvement in the search for a lasting settlement. On Iraq, both sides agreed to continue working together for a common position in the Security Council. Arms exports to Syria were not specifically discussed, but the Foreign Secretary and Ivanov agreed on the need to avoid destabilising and uncontrolled arms exports. Ivanov plans to visit the UK in May.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Russian Prime Minister about the Christian school in St. Petersburg that is under siege. [75804]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 March 1999]: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made no representations to the Russian Prime Minister about the Christian school in St. Petersburg. Our representatives in St. Petersburg and Moscow are, however, following the situation closely as it develops.

South Africa

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to (a) Spain, (b) France, (c) Portugal, (d) Italy and (e) Greece about their refusal to endorse the free trade agreement with South Africa. [75768]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 March 1999]: At the General Affairs Council on 22 February, which my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I attended, the UK pressed hard for endorsement of a Trade & Cooperation Agreement between the EU and South Africa. My hon. Friend the Prime Minister has also urged member states to support the latest deal, most recently at the informal European Council on 26 February.

Sierra Leone

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what steps were taken by (a) special advisers, (b) Ministers, (c) officials or (d) other persons on behalf of his Department to seek to obtain (i) a draft copy and (ii) the key conclusions of the Foreign Affairs Committee report on Sierra Leone; [75887]

(2) on what date and at what time he told the Permanent Secretary that he had received (a) the leaked draft and (b) the leaked key conclusions of the Foreign Affairs Committee report on Sierra Leone; [75885]

(3) if he informed the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) that he had received from him the copy of the leaked draft of the Foreign Affairs Committee report on Sierra Leone. [75886]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 4 March 1999, Official Report, columns 875–76.

Foreign Affairs Committee

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many copies were made of the leaked Foreign Affairs Committee documents on (a) its Human Rights inquiry and (b) its European Union enlargement inquiry; and to whom they were circulated; [75859]

(2) what means the copies of the leaked Foreign Affairs Committee documents on (a) its Human Rights inquiry and (b) its European Union enlargement inquiry were sent to him or his Department; [75860]

(3) when (a) he, (b) his Ministers, (c) his officials, (d) his advisers and (e) departmental parliamentary private secretaries first had sight of the leaked Foreign Affairs Committee documents on (i) its Human Rights inquiry and (ii) its European Union enlargement inquiry; and what use he and they made of the leaked documents. [75861]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on the 4 March 1999, Official Report, column 876.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when proposals for a directive concerning the regulations for growing and sale of genetically modified crops were first received by his Department from the European Commission; what observations were made by his Department prior to publication of the draft directive and on what evidence these observations were based; on what dates relevant explanatory memoranda were signed by ministers and placed in the Vote Office; and if he will publish the terms of such memoranda in the Official Report. [72178]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 22 February 1999]: The Directive 90/220 on the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms was negotiated in the late 1980s and adopted on 23 April 1990. The Genetically Modified Organisms (Deliberate Release) Regulations 1992 were made under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, and came into force on 1 February 1993.

The European Commission adopted a Report on the review of Directive 90/220 on 10 December 1996. Following this, the Commission published its proposal for the amendment of Directive 90/220 in February 1998. UK Government officials participated in discussions on the draft proposal, prior to its adoption by the Commission, during meetings of the 90/220 Competent Authorities.

The Competent Authorities for Directive 90/220 submitted written comments on a Commission Working Document in Autumn 1997. These focused on, among other issues, the difficulties in implementing the current directive due to differences between Member States about interpretation and delays by the Commission. These comments were based on experience of operating the directive. The views of interested parties were actively sought throughout this process.

An Orientation Debate was held in the June 1998 Council of Environment Ministers under the British Presidency of the European Union. Negotiations were subsequently held under the Austrian Presidency and the proposal was further considered by Ministers at the December 1998 Environment Council. The German Presidency has not yet indicated its timetable for discussion of the proposal.

Explanatory Memorandum 6378/98 covering the Commission's proposal was submitted by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on 23 March 1998. EM 6378/98 was considered by the House of Commons European Scrutiny Committee on 29 April 1998. The committee recommended that the document was of political interest and requested further information. The Minister for the Environment responded to the points raised by the Committee in a letter dated 27 November 1997. At their meeting of 9 December 1998, the Committee recommended the proposal for debate in Standing Committee A. The debate has yet to take place, but will be held in good time before any decision is taken in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which parts of (a) the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and (b) the European Directive 90/220 concerning the growing of genetically modified crops for purposes of research are administered by his Department; how many applications he has received for such cultivation and where the locations of such cultivations are publicly listed; what surveillance is undertaken by officers of his Department in respect of such activities; and what tests are applied by them in advising the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and his officials concerning applications to them for cultivation for market sales. [72177]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 22 February 1999]: The release of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) for research purposes are governed by the Genetically Modified Organisms (Deliberate Release) Regulations 1992 (amended 1995 and 1997) which give effect to Part VI of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. Together, these Regulations implement Council Directive 90/220/EEC

"on the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms", of which Part B refers to deliberate releases for research and development purposes. These regulations are administered by my Department, in consultation with MAFF, the Scottish Office and the Welsh Office. This is a matter for which the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh and Northern Ireland Assemblies will also be responsible after devolution.

Since the regulations came into force on 1 February 1993, 153 consents have been issued for the release of genetically modified crops. Details of these consents, including the locations at which they have been released, are on the statutory public register held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

All applications received by my Department for the release of genetically modified crops, either for research or for marketing, are copied for comment to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The statutory Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment which advises the Secretary of State on the safety of GMOs in the environment also advises MAFF Ministers.

The Secretary of State has delegated the inspection and enforcement powers provided under Part VI of the Environment Protection Act 1990 to the Health and Safety Commission and Executive. HSE specialist inspectors visit a proportion of release sites to ensure that the releases are being conducted in accordance to the specifications set out in the consent. Full reports of the inspections are sent to DETR.

Seahorse and Exodus Incident

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations his Department has received on the Seahorse and Exodus incident of March 1997; if his Department has been informed of the findings of the investigation; if he will deposit those findings in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [74440]

Dr. Reid: A collision occurred between the United Kingdom registered fishing vessel Seahorse and the Irish registered fishing vessel Exodus in Bantry Bay, Ireland in March 1997. One crew member of the Exodus died. The Marine Accidents Investigation Branch undertook an Inspector's Investigation into the incident. The Inspector's report has not been published but a copy was forwarded to the Irish Maritime Authorities. The collision took place in Irish waters and the Irish Maritime Authorities are undertaking their own investigation into the incident. Their report will be published in due course. Following the incident the master of the Seahorse was successfully prosecuted by the Irish Authorities for a breach of the International Collision Regulations.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment his Department has made of the cost-effectiveness of campaigns to improve the take-up of energy efficiency measures in the domestic sector. [75207]

Mr. Meale: Each of the schemes to improve take-up of energy efficiency measures in the domestic sector is monitored, performance, including cost effectiveness, is reviewed at regular intervals and schemes are amended where that is appropriate. For example:

The performance of the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme is reviewed quarterly, and a full review of the scheme is taking place as part of the Government's review of fuel poverty policy.

Independent impact assessment of the Best Practice Programme, which covers the managed housing stock, is undertaken on an ongoing basis.

Each of the Energy Saving Trust's projects is monitored and assessed. In addition the Trust's programme of work for my Department is reviewed quarterly, and a full evaluation of the Trust's programmes is planned in the next year.

The Energy Regulator's Standards Of Performance schemes were recently reviewed by NAO.

London River Services

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to ensure that the introduction of new commuter services on the River Thames does not undermine established tourist operations; [75265]

(2) what representations his Department has received concerning the honouring by London River Services after 1 April 1999 of agreements and licences which the Port of London Authority entered into with boat operators; [75261]

(3) what steps his Department is taking to ensure that agreements and licences which the Port of London Authority entered into with boat operators are honoured by London River Services after 1 April. [75262]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department has received a number of representations from and on behalf of Catamaran Cruisers Ltd. and the Thames Passenger Services Federation about this matter. London River Services Ltd. (LRSL) has been set up to manage river services operating from the piers currently owned by the Port of London Authority and certain other new piers.

The Government support LRSL's objectives, which are to:

Provide a comprehensive network of high quality river boat services (commuter and leisure) to meet London's river travel needs, having regard to efficiency, economy and safety of operation;

Maximise passenger benefits and usage within the funds available;

Support multi-modal travel facilities;

Develop and improve the infrastructure and information services which support the river network.

In pursuing these objectives within the context of the Government's Thames 2000 initiative, we believe that opportunities will be created for improving and expanding services on the River to the potential benefit of all operators. Neither the Government nor LRS has any wish to undermine existing operators, especially those which deliver a good quality of service and which have invested in new vessels and facilities.

At the operational level, it is for LRS to determine how best to meet these objectives, having regard both to developing the market for river services and the potential impact on the sustainability of existing operators' services. I understand that LRS's proposals have generally been well received by boat operators; and that they are currently in active discussion with Catamaran Cruisers Ltd. about the latter's applications for new licences and are hopeful that an agreed solution can be reached.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will ensure that London River Services does not sell the Thames piers in its ownership. [75263]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Whilst LT retains the right to dispose of assets that are not required for the purposes of its business, the Government believe that its subsidiary, London River Services Ltd., would not be able to fulfil the objectives it was set up to achieve—and which we fully support—without retaining ownership of the key central London piers. Other assets may be disposed of only with the Secretary of State's consent.

In due course it is intended that ownership of the piers should pass to Transport for London. One of Transport for London's main transport duties will be to implement the Mayor's integrated transport strategy. In drawing up that strategy the Mayor will be under a duty to have regard to the desirability of encouraging the use of the River Thames, in particular for the provision of passenger transport services and for the transport of freight.

Landfill

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the statutory status of the EU Landfill of Waste Common Position Paper 49/98 with regard to United Kingdom legislation. [75344]

Mr. Meale: The EU Landfill Directive is still being discussed at European Council and is in draft form. The Common Position paper [Common Position (EC) No 49/98] is the latest official version of the draft directive. As the Directive has not yet been adopted by the European Council, and has yet to enter into force in the European Union, it has no status in UK legislation.

Public Safety Zones

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to issue guidance to local authorities on public safety zones. [75220]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The preparation of draft guidance is in hand. We hope to issue it for consultation in the Spring.

Rural Public Transport

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many new rural public transport routes have been created since 1997. [75501]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department does not collect detailed information on specific public transport routes.

We have distributed the greater part of England's share of the additional £50 million a year for rural public transport to local authorities in the form of the Rural Bus Subsidy Grant. Local authorities have used this money to let contracts for new services, either serving communities for the first time or enhancing existing routes, in accordance with the guidance which we issued to them. Many new services are now in operation.

My Department will be gathering information from local authorities in the coming weeks to assess systematically the impact of this year's Rural Bus Subsidy Grant.

We have also approved 46 bids, totalling £11.4 million, for grant under the Rural Bus Challenge competition to promote innovative local authority bus schemes in England, as well as making £4.2 million of the new money available each year for a Rural Transport Partnership scheme to reduce rural isolation and social exclusion by supporting community-based projects which enhance access to jobs and services.

Road Accidents

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of road accidents caused by drivers falling asleep. [75266]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There is no national estimate of the number of accidents caused by drivers falling asleep. However, research has shown that tiredness is a principal factor in around 10 per cent. of all accidents. Accordingly, it is estimated that around 23,000–24,000 injury accidents a year result from driver fatigue.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he or his ministers have received any advance copy or draft or briefing on the contents of any select committee report before its due publication date and time; and if he will make a statement. [75766]

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75868]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 9 March 1999]: I refer the right hon. and hon. Members to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge, have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

Millennium Compliance (Water Industry)

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what contingency plans he has for making water available in the event of the interruption of supplies caused by the millennium non-compliance of computer systems in the water industry; and if he will make a statement. [76057]

Mr. Meale: In accordance with the Security and Emergency Measures Direction issued by my Department last year, all water and sewerage companies are required to have plans in place to deal with any emergency. The new plans are required to be independently certified and must be with the Department by 1 April. Water companies expect to complete the testing and any rectification of embedded IT systems by the end of July and they will also test and, if necessary, upgrade their contingency plans. The Director-General of Water Services is monitoring the water industry's progress in ensuring that potential millennium problems are minimised and he has appointed an independent assessor to check on the completion of the rectification work by water companies and the testing of their contingency plans. The assessor's report will be published by OFWAT in the summer.

National Parks (Appointees)

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those of his appointees currently serving on national park authorities who have military backgrounds. [75569]

Mr. Meale: We do not hold a comprehensive central record of the military service undertaken by Secretary of State appointees to the National Park Authorities; there is no specific requirement for candidates to list military service as part of the appointments process. I will undertake some inquiries and write to the hon. Member.

Housing

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action his Department is taking to follow up the proposal in his July 1998 statement on housing and regeneration policy, for a single allocation to local housing authorities for capital investment in housing; and if he will make a statement. [76017]

Ms Armstrong: In October, my Department issued a consultation paper on creating a single housing allocation for capital investment to local authorities, which followed up proposals contained in the Deputy Prime Minister's statement on housing and regeneration policy in July 1998. A single capital allocation for housing is part of the Government's agenda for modernising local government finance. It aims to give local authorities more discretion in deciding their capital programme for housing. The proposal will have some impact on distribution to authorities with high levels of capital receipts relative to need. Such authorities will be expected to make a greater contribution to capital investment in housing in their area from these resources. Authorities with greater need will receive more resources.

Most respondents to the consultation paper welcomed the main principle of our proposals. Some expressed concerns about the effect on the distribution of resources between local authorities, the possible impact on private sector renewal activity, and the timing of the change. I have given careful consideration to all these issues, but I have concluded that we should proceed as planned with the introduction of a single housing capital allocation in 2000–01. The guidance to be issued to local authorities for this year's Housing Investment Programme will cover the detailed implementation of the single pot. It will also address concerns raised in consultation responses about the importance of taking full account of the needs of the private sector in authorities' housing strategies.

I accept that some arrangements will be necessary to facilitate the transition to a single allocation. My officials will shortly be writing to the local authority associations with details of the arrangements we propose to make.

Racing Pigeons

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has received a report of the research which he commissioned into the predation of racing pigeons; and if he will make a statement. [75571]

Mr. Meale: My Department has received a draft final report from the contractors, which will be published as soon as possible.

Rail Freight

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of freight was transported by rail in the last year for which figures are available; and what assessment he has made of the capacity of the railways to deal with increases in demand. [75300]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In 1997, rail accounted for 7 per cent. of total tonne kilometres moved in Great Britain. The need to further develop rail freight is one of the key reasons for setting up the Strategic Rail Authority. One of the Authority's most important tasks will be to address the needs of freight as well as passengers, and the balance between the capacity demands of each.

Planning

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to (a) speed up and (b) simplify planning procedures. [75303]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government are committed to making the planning system operate more efficiently and effectively. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning set out a range of measures to achieve this in the Modernising Planning Statement he published on 15 January 1998. This included proposals to improve the delivery of local plans and unitary development plans; increase the regional ownership and effectiveness of regional planning guidance; speed up the handling of planning appeals; and improve local planning performance through "Best Value".

The Government have recently published for public consultation a draft revised Planning Policy Guidance note 12 (PPG12) on improving the quality and speed of development plan preparation and a draft PPG11 on more streamlined and inclusive arrangements for regional planning guidance. Good practice guides on development briefs and the one-stop-shop approach to development-related approvals were published in April 1998 and the Department is funding a good practice guide on "Best Value" in planning being drawn up by the Planning Officers' Society. A number of other initiatives are underway, including reviews of consultation procedures for planning applications and of procedures for handling listed building consent applications, and inclusion of streamlining planning decisions for business as a theme for the first year of Beacon Councils in the prospectus issued in February 1999.

The Government issued for consultation last year proposals to improve appeal procedures and are currently considering the outcome. Proposals to streamline the handling of major infrastructure projects are being developed for consultation. The Department sets targets for the handling of planning appeals by the Planning Inspectorate. We have recently published improved, long-term targets so that, by 2001–02, the Inspectorate will be expected to decide 80 per cent. of appeals by written representations within 16 weeks; 80 per cent. of appeals by hearing within 22 weeks; and 80 per cent. of appeals by inquiry within 30 weeks.

The Department is continuing to monitor closely local authorities' performance in reaching decisions on planning applications and publishes regular Planning Performance Checklists. My right hon. Friend is currently holding a series of meetings with a selection of local authorities in each English region to discuss what more might be done to improve handling of planning applications as well as development plan preparation and to share good practice. These meetings are part of our wider commitment to work in partnership with local government to deliver a modernised planning system. We have recently agreed with the Local Government Association a Planning Concordat which sets out our shared objectives as the basis for taking our partnership forward.

Big Leaf Mahogany

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase international protection for big leaf mahogany; and if he will ban its import. [75301]

Mr. Meale: All populations in the Americas of Big-leaf mahogany (Swietenia macrophylla) are already listed on Appendix III of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) and Annex C of the EC Wildlife Trade Regulation, which implements CITES within the European Union. Imports of Big-leaf mahogany therefore require an export permit or certificate issued by the country of origin before they can enter the EU. In addition, the importer has to provide a notification form. By this close monitoring, the EU aims to ensure that international trade remains at sustainable levels.

Regeneration

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of single regeneration budget money under rounds one to four was targeted on schemes in non-conurbation localities which have areas of multiple deprivation comparable with conurbation areas; and if he will make a statement. [75308]

Mr. Meale: Support from the SRB is given to partnerships under a bidding process which includes a competitive element. Bids are judged against programme objectives and assessment criteria given in a Bidding Guidance for each round. SRB (Challenge Fund) Rounds 1 to 4 are under way with over 600 regeneration schemes being supported. The table gives an estimate of the proportion of SRB Rounds 1–3 resources by seven groupings.

Area type	Total SRB spend rounds 1–3 estimated £ million	Percentage of total SRB spend
London Borough	822	26
Metropolitan Cities and Districts	1,289	41
Non-metropolitan Cities	313	10
Districts with industrial areas or new towns	429	14
Resort, port and retirement	126	4
Urban and rural-urban mixed	83	3
Remoter mainly rural	65	2
England	3,127	100

Note:
The estimates for rounds 1–3 are based on data from an exercise carried out by the University of Cambridge as part of their evaluation of the SRB—'The distribution of SRB CF Expenditure in relation to Local Area Needs in England' and which was published in March 1998. A similar analysis for Round 4 funding is not yet available.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to tackle the causes of social and economic decline in (a) conurbation localities, (b) non-conurbation localities and (c) rural areas. [75309]

Mr. Meale: Following the Comprehensive Spending Review, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister set out details of the New Deal for Regeneration in his Housing and Regeneration Policy statement on 22 July 1998, which will receive over £3 billion over the next three years. This included a reshaped Single Regeneration Budget (SRB) with about 80 per cent. of new SRB resources targeted on the most deprived areas, based on the 1998 Index of Local Deprivation. SRB resources may contribute to schemes also supported by European funding, including Structural Funds. Also there is a new programme, the New Deal for Communities, which combats social exclusion through focused and intensive neighbourhood renewal, in the most deprived neighbourhoods.

English Partnerships promote job creation, inward investment and environmental improvement by bringing derelict, vacant and contaminated land back into productive use.

Rural areas benefit from resources directed through the SRB. The Rural Challenge Fund previously managed by the Rural Development Commission (RDC) has been incorporated into the SRB and bids covering rural areas will be eligible for SRB support. In addition, the RDC's rural regeneration programmes continue to support a variety of regeneration projects in the rural development areas designated by the RDC, as do English Partnerships and European structural funds in Objective 5b areas. The Government will be setting out their policies for rural England in a White Paper to be published later in the year.

The regional activities of English Partnerships, the administration of the SRB and the RDCs' rural regeneration programmes will transfer to new Regional Development Agencies on 1 April 1999 (from April 2000 in London).

The Government strongly support the Local Government Association's New Commitment to Regeneration initiative which is seeking a more co-ordinated and flexible approach to regeneration in 22 pathfinder areas through the preparation of comprehensive regeneration strategies for their areas.

The Government will be setting out their policies for cities and towns in an Urban White Paper to be published later this year.

Electoral Review

Mr. Linton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he proposes next to implement the periodic electoral review recommendations which he has received from the Local Government Commission for England; what is his policy for implementing future reviews; and if he will make a statement. [76016]

Ms Armstrong: Where we accept the LGC periodic electoral review recommendations our intention is to implement them as soon as practicable on a normal election day whilst ensuring that no council holds whole council elections in consecutive years.

Accordingly we are now proposing, for those district councils and county councils where final recommendations are received no later than July 2000, and where we accept them, that implementation should be on the normal election day in May 2001. For those district councils and county councils where final recommendations are received between August 2000 and July 2002 and, where we accept them, implementation should be on the normal election day in May 2003.

This means that in May 2001, the normal election day for all county councils in England, there will be additional whole council elections for certain district councils. In May 2003, the normal election day for all whole council district council elections, there will be additional elections for certain county councils.

We are not making any special proposals for implementing the Commission's reviews of London boroughs. We envisage their implementation on the next normal election day for the boroughs in May 2002, a timetable consistent with the Commission's recommendations being received between June 1999 and January 2000.

We are now consulting the Local Government Association, the National Association of Local Councils, the Association of Electoral Administrators, the Local Government Commission, the Parliamentary Boundary Commission and the main political parties on the proposals. Following this consultation we will decide how to proceed.

Airports Policy

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the timetable for the review of his Department's UK airports policy and implementation of resulting recommendations. [75425]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We announced in "A New Deal for Transport" (Cm 3950) that we will prepare a UK airports policy looking some 30 years ahead, and that in doing so we will take account of the Inspector's report on the Heathrow Terminal 5 Inquiry. After the Secretary of State has received the Inspector's report, the Government will, of course, need to consider it carefully before we can come to decisions on his recommendations and can publish the new airports policy. In the meantime we are pressing ahead with preparatory studies needed for the review of airports policy.

Air Safety

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many incidents there have been in each of the last five years of objects falling from commercial airlines over the UK; and how many such falling objects have caused (a) personal injury and (b) damage to building. [75676]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of incidents of falling objects reported to the Civil Aviation Authority are as follows:

	Total number of incidents	Number causing damage on ground	Personal injury
1994	52	27	0
1995	41	23	0
1996	56	32	0
1997	61	29	0
1998	60	34	0

Note:
These objects include ice fragments and other miscellaneous items. Generally it is not possible to confirm the precise origin of such objects. The figures for incidents of damage on the ground include damage to items such as cars, garden furniture and patios as well as buildings.

Rail Services

Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what provision he is making for the cost of rail services secured by the English Passenger Transport Executive in 1999–2000. [76409]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A special grant report has been laid before the House today for the payment of Metropolitan Railway Passenger Service Grant in 1999–2000 to English Passenger Transport Authorities (PTAs). The main purpose of the grant is to provide support to those PTAs for the local rail services provided by franchise operators and secured by the PTAs' Passenger Transport Executives under the terms of the franchise agreements with franchisees and the Director of Passenger Rail Franchising.

Ships (Inspections)

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many ships were found to be unhygienic as a result of the inspections of ships for nuisances; and how many special notices were served under the provisions of the Public Health (Ships) Regulations 1979 in each year since 1990. [74968]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

The Department does not keep central records on the results of tests made under the Environmental Health Act 1990 and the Public Health (Ships) Regulations 1979, which are a local inspection function. However, the Maritime and Coastguard Agency has provided figures on the number of ships detained under Merchant Shipping legislation where deficiencies have included food and hygiene items. Figures before 1994–95 are not available.

Year	Number of ships detained where deficiencies included food and hygiene items
1994–95	48
1995–96	63
1996–97	64
1997–98	75

WALES

Bell Pottinger Good Relations

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his decision to award the contract for providing information about the National Assembly to Bell Pottinger Good Relations. [73005]

Mr. Michael: My Department appointed Howell Henry Chaldecott Lury following a competition arranged by the Central Office of Information on behalf of the Welsh Office. They were appointed on the basis that they gave the strongest, most effective response to the tendered campaign.

All competing Agencies were required to demonstrate that they could deal effectively with local issues and operate effectively with the Welsh Office in Cardiff. Howell Henry Chaldecott Lury invited sister company Bell Pottinger Good Relations to assist them in the competition to meet this requirement, and to provide wider expertise for the National Assembly for Wales campaign.

This appointment was ratified by the Independent Advisory Committee on Advertising.

Council Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last discussed housing problems with council housing authorities; and if he will make a statement. [74180]

Mr. Michael: As Chair of the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance, I meet local authority housing representatives on a regular basis. At the last of these meetings on 15 December housing issues were discussed.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

A4042 (Llanover)

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from the pupils of Llanover Primary School concerning the speed limit on the A4042 in Llanover, near Abergavenny; what plans he has to review the speed limit on the road; and if he will make a statement. [74888]

Mr. Hain: The Headteacher of Llanover Primary School sent the former Secretary of State a selection of letters from pupils concerning the speed of traffic along the nearby A4042 in May 1998.

Since traffic generally travels at under 50 mph along this stretch of road past the village, there are no plans for a reduced speed limit as it would not essentially be self regulating.

We will however continue to keep this part of the A4042 under review and will review the speed limit if there is any significant change in the situation there.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

As announced in the White Paper on the future of transport, a national review is under way to develop a speed policy that takes account of the contribution of reduced speeds to environmental and social objectives as well as to road safety.

Departmental Cash Limits

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes he proposes to make to his voted cash limits for the current year. [76353]

Mr. Michael: Subject to the approval of the related Supplementary Estimate, I propose to increase the cash limit on class XIV, vote 2 by £4,144,000 from £851,924,000 to £856,068,000. This increase results from an addition to the education programme for the purchase of school books, as announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement on 9 March 1999, Official Report, columns 173–90. Schools will have until July of this year to spend their allocations of these extra resources. This increase will be met from the Reserve and will not add to the overall level of public expenditure.

NHS Trusts

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will announce his decisions on the amended proposals to reconfigure NHS trusts in Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan. [76399]

Mr. Michael: I have today announced my decision to establish the University Hospital of Wales and Llandough NHS Trust and the Cardiff and District Community NHS Trust to become operational on 1 April 1999. This decision follows public consultation which ended on 28 January, and supports my vision for the NHS in Wales made in my statement to the House on 3 December 1998, Official Report, columns 1053–66. The establishment of these two trusts is a first step towards creating a single integrated health service for Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan with acute, community and mental health services delivered through a single trust. In order to bring as much certainty as possible to the process so that staff in the new trusts know exactly where they stand, a further public consultation will start in July on the details of the process of forming the single trust and on the timing, which it is hoped will be sooner rather than later.

A copy of the press release detailing my announcement, along with a summary of all responses received by the Welsh Office on this matter during the consultation period, a copy of the report of the reconfiguration project team on local consultation and a copy of the report of independent consultants who were commissioned to undertake an evaluation of the consultation proposals, has been placed in the Library of the House.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Housing Association (House Starts)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the planned starts for homes to be built by housing associations in 1998–99. [75494]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Housing associations are expected to achieve starts on up to 2,300 homes during the year, of which approximately 70% will be new build.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75879]

Mr. Michael: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge, has there been any occasion on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Interpreters

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the occasions on which cases have (a) collapsed and (b) gone to appeal on the basis of inadequate interpreter provision for defendants in each of the last two years. [75341]

Mr. Hoon: I regret that this information is not collected, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what professional standards and qualifications are required of interpreters working in English courts. [75342]

Mr. Hoon: Interpreters working in English courts are not required by law to have a formal qualification or to have reached a specific professional standard. However, all agencies in the criminal justice system are parties to an agreement with the aim that, by the end of 2001, every interpreter working in courts should be selected from the National Register of Public Service Interpreters or the Council for the Advancement of Communication with Deaf People (CACDP) National Directory of sign Language Interpreters. An inter-agency working group is monitoring progress of the agreement. Those arranging interpreters are encouraged to find an interpreter from the National Register or Directory in the first instance. Where a person cannot be found from those sources, they will look elsewhere for an interpreter of at least the same standard.

In the civil courts it is the responsibility of the plaintiff or defendant or their legal adviser to provide any foreign language interpreter. The court can refer inquiries from parties to appropriate lists. The Court Service has an agreement with the Royal National Institute for Deaf People to provide a sign language interpreter, who must be registered by the CACDP, whenever such an interpreter is required.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what measures exist to ensure that accused persons whose first language is not English receive a fair trial in English courts. [75340]

Mr. Hoon: Where the accused's first language is not English, and he would not otherwise understand the proceedings, the court will arrange a foreign language or sign language interpreter for him at court. The only exception is where the defendant appears in court within up to two working days of being charged, where it is for the police or other prosecuting agency to make the necessary arrangements. The interpreter's fee is paid from public funds.

Retirement Ages

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates are aged between 65 and 70 years. [75267]

Mr. Hoon: 3,767 magistrates in England and Wales (excluding the Duchy of Lancaster) are aged between 65 and 70 years.

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the retirement age for lay members of each of the tribunals for which he has responsibility. [75268]

Mr. Hoon: Of the tribunals for which the Lord Chancellor has ministerial responsibility, only three include a lay membership. They are lay members of the Immigration Appeal Tribunal; service and medical members of the Pensions Appeal Tribunal; and surveyor members of the Lands Tribunal. Under the terms of the Judicial Pensions and Retirement Act 1993, lay members appointed to each of these tribunals on or after 31 March 1995 shall vacate office when they attain the age of 70. However, the Judicial Pensions and Retirement Act contains provisions which allows the Lord Chancellor, in exceptional circumstances, to authorise continuance in office up to the age of 75 and transitional provisions which preserve the pre-existing compulsory retirement age of the end of year of service in which they reach 72 for those already serving on 31 March 1995.

Legal Aid (Foreign Nationals)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of the legal aid budget was spent on cases pursued by foreign nationals in courts in England and Wales in (a) 1989 and (b) in each of the last three years. [75222]

Mr. Hoon: The information requested is not available. The nationality of an applicant is not one of the qualifying factors for legal aid. Therefore, the data collected by the Legal Aid Board and the courts do not identify separately applications made for legal aid by foreign nationals.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75869]

Mr. Hoon: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me, or the Lord Chancellor, drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor to the best of my knowledge have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to any civil servant or the Special Adviser in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75881]

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if (a) ministers, (b) parliamentary private secretaries, (c) special advisers and (d) civil servants have discussed the contents of the Committee's reports with any members of the Social Security Committee prior to their publication; [75841]

(2) if (a) ministers, (b) parliamentary private secretaries, (c) special advisers and (d) civil servants in his Department have received copies of any Social Security Select Committee (i) draft reports and (ii) reports prior to their publication. [75840]

Mr. Darling: I refer the right hon. and hon. Members to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me, or my Ministerial colleagues, drafts of Select Committee reports, or parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor to the best of my knowledge have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in this Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list the groups of disabled people which will automatically be exempted from the new system of periodically reviewing awards of disability living allowance; [69224]

(2) if the proposed system of periodically reviewing awards of disability living allowance announced on 28 January will include the safeguards announced on 9 February 1998 in respect of the Benefit Integrity Project. [69220]

Mr. Bayley [pursuant to his reply, 11 February 1999, c. 381–82]: From April 1999 a new system of periodically reviewing entitlement to Disability Living Allowance (DLA) will be introduced. We intend to incorporate the lessons already learned and to evaluate and refine the process as it develops. At the outset, not only DLA recipients whose cases were examined by the Benefit Integrity Project (BIP) will be excluded from the process, but also people in any one of the specific categories listed who were previously excluded from the action of the BIP will be excluded.

Groups to be exempt at the outset:

People receiving the higher rate of the DLA mobility component and either the highest or the middle rate of the DLA care component who are:

- Paraplegic;
- Tetraplegic;
- Quadriplegic;
- Both deaf and blind;
- Double amputees;
- Over the age of 65; or
- With an award made prior to April 1992.

People receiving the higher rate of the DLA mobility component and the highest rate of the DLA care component with:

- Cystic Fibrosis;
- Dementia;
- Haemodialysis;
- Hyperkinetic Syndrome;
- Learning difficulty[1]
- Multiple Allergy Syndrome;
- Multiple Sclerosis;
- Motor Neurone Disease;
- Neurological Disease (including Muscular Dystrophy);
- Parkinson's Disease;
- Total Parenteral Nutrition or who are Severely Mentally Impaired[2].

People treated as being terminally ill under criteria set out in Section 66(2)(a) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 will also be excluded, as will anyone with a fixed period award due to end within the next three years. Safeguards developed and introduced during the lifetime of the BIP will be carried forward into the new process. This will include the changes in evidence gathering introduced on 9 February 1998; which ensured that no decision to reduce or remove entitlement to DLA is based solely on the information provided by the claimant.

[1] This category applies to people whose main disabling condition has been recorded as "mental subnormality"

[2] This category applies to people who meet the criteria set out in Section 73(3) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 and Regulation 12(5)&(6) of the Social Security (Disability Living Allowance) Regulations 1991.

Pensioners

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 8 February 1999, Official Report, column 68, on pensioner incomes, if the information requested is now available. [75028]

Mr. Timms: The information requested is now available and is in the tables.

Notes:

1. Figures are given to the nearest 10,000 pensioner benefit units, although they are not necessarily accurate to that degree. Figures of less than 5,000 pensioners are denoted by '*'.
2. Figures may not sum to row or column totals due to rounding.
3. Figures should be treated with caution since taxpaying status is not directly measured by the Family Resources Survey, but has been imputed using a model based on policies announced up to and including the 1998 budget statement.
4. Pensioner benefit units are defined as single people and couples (married or cohabiting) where at least one partner is aged over 59. Couples are allocated to age bands according to the age of the older partner.
5. Taxpaying pensioner benefit units are defined as those where at least one individual in the benefit unit is modelled as liable to income tax.

Family Resources Survey 1996–97

Family Resources Survey

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate is provided by his Department's Family Resources Survey of the number and proportion of (a) local authority tenants, (b) other social tenants, (c) private renters and (d) owner occupiers who are families with dependent children. [75168]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Number and proportion of households with families and dependant children, by tenure type

Tenure type	Number	Percentage
Local authority tenants	1,250,000	28
Other social tenants	330,000	30
Private renters	410,000	21
Owner occupiers	3,940,000	25

Notes:

1. "Local authority tenants" were defined as those households where the landlord was either a local authority/council, a New Town development or Scottish Homes and where the property did not go with the job of anyone in the household. "Other social tenants" was defined as those households where the landlord was either a Housing Association, a co-operative or a charitable trust and where the property did not go with the job of anyone in the household. "Private renters" were defined as those households where the landlord was an employer, friend or relative of a household member, or another private landlord or organisation. "Owner occupiers" were identified as those households that were either owned outright, being bought with the help of a mortgage or loan, or were part rented and part mortgaged.
2. "Households with families and dependant children" were defined as those households where there was at least one couple or lone parent with at least one dependant child. Pensioner couples with any dependant children were also included in this definition.
3. Absolute values are rounded to the nearest ten thousand. Percentages are rounded to the nearest integer.
4. Estimates are subject to sampling error and to variability in non-response.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the locations at which temperature readings were taken for the cold weather payments scheme in 1998–99. [75260]

Angela Eagle: 72 weather stations are being used in the scheme this winter.

A schedule of the weather stations and postcodes linked to each of them is contained in the Social Fund Cold Weather Payments (General) Amendment Regulations 1998 (SI 1998 No. 2455), a copy of which is available in the Library.

Overseas Pensioners

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has held with other Governments about extending bilateral agreements to protect the position of UK overseas pensioners; and if he will make a statement. [75237]

Mr. Timms: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has held no discussions about extending bilateral Social Security agreements to cover uprating of UK State Pensions paid to pensioners living overseas. Bilateral agreements can be the means of providing annual increases of Retirement Pension, but that is not their primary purpose. An agreement is not strictly necessary to allow payment of pension increases, as that could be achieved through changing UK domestic legislation.

Child Benefit

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children will benefit from this April's increase in child benefit in (a) the Medway towns and (b) Chatham and Aylesford. [75554]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Child Benefit is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, Peter Mathison. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Jonathan Shaw, dated 9 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many children will benefit from this April's increase in child benefit in (a) the Medway towns and (b) Chatham and Aylesford. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

Unfortunately the information to identify families, by region, who are receiving Child Benefit is not readily available. These figures could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

I can however, explain the new rates of Child Benefit from April 1999. They will be £14.40 for the eldest child and £9.60 for each subsequent child. The increase for the eldest child includes the extra £2.50 a week announced in the March 1998 budget, plus uprating. This is an overall increase of £3.25 for a family with two children.

I am sorry I could not be of more help on this occasion.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families in (a) the Tamworth constituency and (b) Staffordshire will receive the increase in child benefit. [75656]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Child Benefit is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, Peter Mathison. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Brian Jenkins, dated 9 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many families in (a) the Tamworth constituency and (b) Staffordshire will receive the increase in child benefit. As Mr Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Sexual Offences

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Attorney-General what official changes in prosecution policy were made in respect of the offences of (a) buggery, (b) indecent assault on a male, (c) indecency between males, (d) rape, (e) indecent assault on a female, (f) unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 13 years, (g) unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 16 years, (h) incest and (i) gross indecency with a child, between 1987 and 1997. [75033]

The Attorney-General: The Crown Prosecution Service reviews and prosecutes all cases in accordance with the principles set out in the Code for Crown Prosecutors, issued under section 10 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985. The provisions of the Code are set out in the Director of Public Prosecution's Annual Report, copies of which are in the Library of the House. The Code, first published in 1986, was subsequently revised in 1992 and again in 1994. The 1994 edition of the Code simplifies the language of the Code; it clarifies the evidential criterion and the public interest factors in favour of a prosecution.

The general principles set out in the Code for Crown Prosecutors are supported by internal CPS guidance. The internal guidance is not presently in the public domain. In any event, tracing its development over the period covered by the question would not be practical and would involve a disproportionate cost.

SCOTLAND

Newspapers and Magazines

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the total expenditure of his Department, agencies and related public bodies on newspapers and magazines in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000; if he will list (i) the titles taken and (ii) which titles have been added and which deleted since 1 May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [69198]

Task Forces

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a list of (1) task forces and (2) policy reviews established by his Department since May 1997 which (a) had external members recruited by way of public advertisement, and details of any person so appointed and (b) engaged in public consultation exercises, and the form that these took. [74472]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 9 March 1999]: No members of task forces or policy reviews established since 1 May 1997 were recruited by way of public advertisement. Most task forces and reviews are short-term bodies established to give thorough consideration to important and difficult issues. External members are invited to sit on some task forces and reviews because they are able to contribute specific experience and expertise. In such cases, public advertising would be inappropriate and disproportionate. Since 1 October 1998, appointments to those task forces which qualify for classification as advisory non-departmental public bodies have come within the remit of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

The following task forces and policy reviews are engaged in public consultation exercises.

Task forces and policy reviews
Review of the Scottish Roads Programme	Consultation Paper:'The Appraisal of Trunk Road Investment' (published August 1998)
Review of Transport Policy	Consultation Paper: 'Regional Transport Partnerships and the National Transport Forum for Scotland' (published January 1999) Consultation Paper: 'Local Transport Strategies Preliminary Guidance' (published February 1999)
Working Group on Council Tax Collection	Consultation Paper: 'It Pays to Collect' (published November 1998)
Land Reform Policy Group	Consultation Paper: 'Identifying the Problems' (published February 1998) Consultation Paper: 'Identifying the Solutions' (published September 1998) Series of public meetings (November 1998)
Review of Sites of Special Scientific Interest in Scotland	Consultation Paper: 'People and Nature' (published September 1998)
Scottish Water Industry Review	Consultation Paper: 'Scottish Water Industry Review' (published July 1997)
Working Group on Vulnerable and Intimidated Witnesses	Consultation Paper: 'Towards a Just Conclusion' (published November 1998)
Ministerial Action Group on Standards	Consultation Paper: 'Setting Targets—Raising Standards in Schools' (published 4 March 1998)
Review of Aspects of Gaelic Broadcasting	Consultation Paper: 'A Review of Aspects of Gaelic Broadcasting' (published June 1998)
Committee on Post-School Education and Training of Young People with Special Needs	Consultation workshops (January 1999)

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

School Computers

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many pupils there are per computer in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in each local authority area. [74546]

Mrs. Liddell: According to the most recent Annual Survey of Listening, Viewing and Computing (ASLVC) conducted on behalf of The Scottish Office in 1998, there are 15 pupils per computer in primary schools, 49 per cent. of which are more than four years old and 6 pupils per computer in secondary schools, 54 per cent. of which are over four years old. The sampling arrangements for the ASLVC do not provide information at the local authority level. This information will be collected in future as part of the monitoring arrangements for the Excellence Fund.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Nursing Vacancies

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many NHS nursing vacancies there were at the latest available date. [74515]

Mr. Galbraith: As at 31 March 1998, there were 1,097 whole-time equivalent qualified nursing staff vacancies in the NHS in Scotland. This represents a vacancy rate of 3.5 per cent. part of which is turnover.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Internet (Schools)

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of schools have internet and e-mail access for pupils in each local authority area. [74531]

Mrs. Liddell: According to the most recent Annual Survey of Listening, Viewing and Computing (ASLVC) conducted on behalf of The Scottish Office in 1998, 22 per cent. of primary schools and 73 per cent. of secondary schools have some form of internet access. 39 per cent. of primary schools and 72 per cent. of secondary schools have e-mail facilities. The sampling arrangements for the ASLVC do not provide information at the local authority level. This information will be collected in future as part of the monitoring arrangements for the Excellence Fund.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Electoral Roll

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many individuals are on the electoral roll in Scotland. [75507]

Mr. McLeish: There were 4,005,720 local government electors on the electoral registers for Scotland which came into force on 16 February 1998. Local government electors are also entitled to vote in Scottish Parliament elections. There were 3,992,502 Parliamentary electors on the registers which came into force on 16 February 1998. Numbers of electors on the electoral registers published on 16 February 1999 are not yet available centrally. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as this information can be obtained.

Teachers

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what the total number of (a) primary and (b) secondary school teachers in Scotland was in each year since 1992. [74510]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested is set out in the table.

Number of full-time equivalent teachers in publicly funded primary and secondary schools in Scotland

	Primary	Secondary
1992–93	22,747	24,041
1993–94	22,472	24,326
1994–95	22,659	24,522
1995–96	22,550	24,593
1996–97	22,483	24,265
1997–98	22,187	23,875

As from 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Government Expenditure

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the balance between Government expenditure spent in Scotland and Government revenues raised in Scotland in each of the last five years. [75710]

Mr. Dewar: The latest estimates of the fiscal position in Scotland were set out in Table 20 of Government Expenditure and Revenue in Scotland 1996–1997, published in November 1998.

Gas-fired Power Station, Gartcosh

Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will announce his decision on the application submitted by PowerGen for consent under Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to construct and operate a new natural gas-fired power station at Gartcosh, North Lanarkshire. [R] [76350]

Mr. Dewar: I have decided to refuse consent for PowerGen's application. This decision has been taken after careful consideration of the Report of the public inquiry into the application and all subsequent representations received (which related mainly to the Government's new energy policy), and is founded on the Reporter's recommendation that consent be refused. A copy of my decision letter will be placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a mater for the Scottish Parliament.

Ferry Services

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the estimated timetable for the tender and award of franchises for the passenger ferry services to Orkney and Shetland; and if he will make a statement. [75680]

Mr. Dewar: My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for transport in Scotland announced on 14 October 1998 the start of a competitive tendering process for a subsidy to provide lifeline ferry services to the Orkney and Shetland Islands from 2002.

A draft initial proposals document was issued on 22 December 1998 to the Islands Councils and others for comments. Comments received are currently being assessed. A shortlist of potential operators is being draw up. Those selected will be invited soon to submit initial proposals for the services. It is estimated that an award of a contract will be made before the end of 1999.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Nurses

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many whole-time equivalent (a) bank, (b) agency and (c) contract nurses were employed, and at what cost, by health board area in each of the last 10 years. [74990]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 5 March 1999] [pursuant to his reply, 8 March 1999, c. 65–66]: The table in the previous reply was incorrectly reproduced.

The information available for agency nursing staff is shown in the table. No cost data to match the staff numbers are available. Information for bank and contract nursing staff is not available centrally.

Late Payment

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the response by business to legislation on the late payment of debt. [71477]

Mr. Wills: Late payment has a devastating impact on Britain's small businesses. This Government are determined to improve the UK's payment culture to ensure that small businesses can thrive and prosper.

The Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 commenced on 1 November 1998 and provides small suppliers with a statutory right to claim interest on late paid bills and transfers the cost of late payment from the supplier to the late payer.

My Department is working with the Credit Management Research Group at Leeds University to monitor the legislation, although it is too early to draw conclusions about its impact. However, evidence from the recent Grant Thornton International/Business Strategies Ltd. survey has shown an improvement in the time taken by business in the UK to pay its bills. In addition, evidence from other European Countries that have introduced legislation shows that effective legislation can tackle late payment, particularly when supported by other measures.

Mortgages

Valerie Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how he will make the mortgage market more transparent for the benefit of consumers. [76352]

Mr. Byers: Consumers need clear and comparable information about loan offers so they can identify the best deal. I shall be working with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a package of measures to bring greater clarity, comparability and fairness to the marketing of mortgages and other types of credit.

We will shortly specify the way in which the Annual Percentage Rate (APR) for low-start and discount mortgages is calculated to require it to reflect the interest and total charges throughout the entire life of the loan. This will ensure that lenders advertise these products on a basis which will permit consumers to compare more easily the cost of one offer with another.

In the next two months, we shall also consult on proposals to limit the circumstances in which interest rates other than the APR can be shown in credit advertisements and pre-contractual information to those in which alternative interest rates give information which is of real use to consumers in choosing between products.

We are also consulting on a proposal to require warnings such as "Your home is at risk if you do not keep up repayments on a mortgage or other loan secured on it" to be shown in all pre-contractual information. This change will ensure that such warnings are included in brochures, pre-contractual letters and other documents which set out details of loan offers. If we implement this change, we shall remove the requirement for such warnings on advertisements between programmes on radio, television and cinema where they seem to be less useful for consumers.

We will shortly implement an EU Directive which requires only one formula to calculate the APR to be used throughout the European Union. This will enable consumers to make easy comparisons between different loan offers from lenders throughout Europe.

We will also extend the scope for bodies in addition to the Director General of Fair Trading to take injunctive action under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1994. Regulators, including the Financial Services Authority, as well as consumer bodies will receive these powers.

Over the next year, we will consult on further measures to improve consumer protection.

I am concerned that the current provisions on extortionate credit in the Consumer Credit Act 1974 do not adequately safeguard vulnerable consumers against the charging of unjust interest rates. DTI has commissioned research on which we shall base proposals to improve consumer protection in this crucial area.

We will also consult on a proposal to change Regulations on the terms on which loans are settled early, and to ensure that consumers know before they take out the loan the terms on which they can settle it. We propose to replace the Rule of 78 with a simpler formula which will be fair and equitable for consumers in a range of circumstances. We also propose to require reasonable indications of the terms of early settlement to be given in pre-contractual information so that consumers have another measure with which they can compare offers.

We will also review the regulation of credit advertising with the aim of making the regulations simpler and more sharply focused on requiring informative and truthful advertising.

Finally, we shall review the practice of exempting named mortgage lenders from the requirement to make regulated agreements under the Consumer Credit Act.

British Ski Instructors

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the ability of British ski instructors to offer ski courses in France; and if he will make a statement. [74402]

Mr. Ian McCartney: My Department has received representations from the British Association of Ski Instructors (BASI), and from individual ski instructors, about difficulties which British-qualified ski instructors have been experiencing when trying to work in France on the basis of the their British qualifications. The Government have been pursuing this matter with the French authorities over the past year. Progress has been slower than we would have wished, but BASI are now talking to representatives of French ski instructors, with the aim of developing a joint technical test. This may offer the prospect of significant progress towards resolving this issue. My Department will, however, continue to keep in close touch with BASI on developments.

World Trade Agreement (Genetically Modified Foodstuffs)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish those parts of the World Trade Agreement that prevent the United Kingdom, or any member state of the European Community from restricting the import of foodstuffs from the United States of America, solely on the grounds of their genetically modified character; the date and place when the agreement was concluded; the names and status of those persons negotiating and signing that agreement on behalf of the United Kingdom; and when that part relating to the import of such foods was considered by Parliament. [73723]

Mr. Wilson: Approval of genetically modified foodstuffs for importation into the EU is governed by EU legislation, specifically the Novel Foods Regulation (258/97/EC). The principles of this Regulation adhere to the WTO Agreement on Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures, which recognises the right of members to take measures necessary for the protection of human, animal or plant health but requires that any trade measures are based on scientific principles and are not maintained without sufficient scientific evidence. This agreement formed part of the WTO Agreement which concluded the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations on 15 December 1993. The WTO Agreement was negotiated by the European Commission in consultation with EC member states under the provisions of the EC Treaties. The Agreement was signed on behalf of the United Kingdom by Mr. Tim Sainsbury in Marrakesh on 15 April 1994. Under the Ponsonby rule, the Agreement was laid before Parliament in May 1994 and debated on 14 June 1994, Official Report, columns 521–601. The United Kingdom's instrument of Ratification to the WTO Agreement was deposited with the GATT Legal Adviser on 30 December 1994. For the EC, the WTO Agreement was accepted by means of a Council decision and assent given by the European Parliament. The Agreement entered into force on 1 January 1995. The main WTO Agreement was published as Treaty Series No. 57 of 1996 (Cm 3277), and the Agreement on Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures as No. 54 of 1996 (Cm 3275). The UK's certified copy of the WTO Agreement resides in the Public Record Office.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes will be made to the cash limits for his Department. [76351]

Mr. Byers: Further to my answer given to the House on 11 February 1999, Official Report, columns 412–13, and subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary revised supplementary estimate, the cash limit for Class V, Vote 2—Department of Trade and Industry: Science—will be increased by £15,000,000 from £1,367,459,000 to £1,382,459,000. This net increase results from additional provision of £15,000,000 for part funding of the University Challenge Fund.

This net increase will be charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Indonesia

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the export credit guarantee cover given to non-military exports to Indonesia since May 1997. [74411]

Mr. Wilson: Since 1 May 1997 ECGD has issued guarantees in respect of two civil projects in Indonesia.

These were, firstly, for power station extensions being undertaken by Allen Power of the Outer Islands Diesel Generating Plant and, secondly, for Reyrolle's provision of 500 KV transmission lines between Ungaran and Klaten and of a 500–150 KV sub-station at Klaten.

Confectionery (Toys)

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) which manufacturers of confectionery containing toys have provided instructions for action to be taken in the event of ingestion of such toys or their container; [73825]

(2) if he will consult consumer, safety and medical experts on the risks to children of choking on toys placed inside confectionery and the steps necessary to prevent it. [73827]

Dr. Howells: I am not aware of any manufacturers providing medical advice on action to be taken in the event of toys being ingested. All toys supplied in the UK—no matter how they are packaged—must meet the safety requirements of the Toys (Safety) Regulations 1995 which implement harmonised European requirements. Research undertaken by DTI has established that the main causes of choking involving children under three years of age are sweets, coins and food objects—none of which is required to be accompanied by medical advice.

DTI has had the issue of choking accidents involving young children under review for some time; has considered information published in various papers; has considered various comments received; and has commissioned research on accident data collected by the Home Accident Surveillance System. However, I would of course welcome any new data or results of research that consumer organisations may be aware of.

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) which reporting category in the HASS system specifically covers choking on, or ingestion of, toys placed by manufacturers inside confectionery; [73826]

(2) which manufacturers of confectionery containing toys have asked his Department for product-specific case listings from the Home and Leisure Accident Surveillance System. [73828]

Dr. Howells: Injuries involving toys or parts of toys are recorded under category 21 of table 10 in the Home Accident Surveillance System report. Details of accidents, including case listings, can also be extracted from the database according to the accident mechanism, e.g. choking. The various ways in which HASS can be interrogated ensures that all the home accidents treated by the A&E departments of the participating hospitals can be accessed.

Data from HASS records are freely available on request to manufacturers, organisations and individuals with an interest in consumer safety. Comprehensive lists of those requesting information are not maintained.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Task Forces

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish a list of (1) task forces and (2) policy reviews established by his Department since May 1997 which (a) had external members recruited by way of public advertisement, and details of any person so appointed and (b) engaged in public consultation exercises, and the form that these took. [74461]

Mr. Straw: No task forces or policy reviews established since May 1997 have had external members recruited by public advertisement. Most task forces and policy reviews are short-term, established to give thorough consideration to important and difficult issues. External members are invited to take part in some reviews and task forces because they are able to contribute to specific experience and expertise. In such cases, public advertising would be inappropriate and disproportionate.

Since 1 October 1998, appointments to those task forces which qualify for classification as advisory non-departmental public bodies have come within the remit of the Commissioner of Public Appointments.

Consultation exercises were associated with the following task forces and policy reviews:

Review	Form of consultation
Review to Consider Permanent UK-Wide Counter Terrorism Legislation	Consultation document published 17 December 1998.
Interdepartmental Review of Police Pensions	Consultation document published on 31 March 1998.
Working Party on Electoral Procedures	Concerned the sale of the electoral register and not about the Working Party's remit as a whole. News release published on 3 August 1998 invited initial responses and is being followed up by meetings and correspondence with interested parties.
Review of Family Court Welfare	A joint consultation document from the Home Office, Lord Chancellor's Department and Department of Health was published in July 1998.
Review of the Interdepartmental Working Group on Preventing Unsuitable People from Working with Children and Abuse of Trust	Written public consultation in August/September 1998, supported by seminars. Further written consultation in January/February 1999.
Review of Immigration and Asylum Appeals	Consultation paper issued on 13 July 1998.
Review on Measures on Community Safety	Consultation paper published September 1997.
Prisons-Probation Review	Consultation paper issued 6 August 1998.
Review of Anti-Social Behaviour	Consultation paper issued September 1997.
Sex Offences Review	Consultation leaflet issued on 25 January 1999.
Interdepartmental Review of Vulnerable or Intimidated Witnesses	Views invited by letter and conference. The report of the Review's Working Group was published for consultation on 10 June 1998.
Review of Arrangements for Confiscation of Criminal Assets	Report issued for consultation in November 1998.
Working Group considering a possible new offence of misuse of public office	Expected to report later in 1999 via a consultation paper.
Task Force on Youth Justice	Draft guidance on establishing youth offending teams published for consultation in February 1998.

Decision 276/1999/EC

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what the nineteenth recital of Decision 276/1999/EC refers; and what is his Department's policy in respect of it. [75055]

Kate Hoey: The 19th recital states that the Community action plan on promoting safer use of the internet by combating illegal and harmful content on global networks should take account of the work accomplished in the field of justice and home affairs. The Government support this proposal, which closely follows our own approach to this issue.

Europol

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans his Department has to make use of Council Act 1999/c26/01 of 3 November 1998 with regard to the supply and sharing of and access to Europol material; what data the United Kingdom have already supplied to (i) the Europol Agency and (ii) the Schengen authorities; for what reason storage is required under the Act; if Article 10.4 enables Europol to carry out intelligence assessments in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [75056]

Kate Hoey: The Europol Convention entered into force on 1 October 1998. Europol has not yet, however, taken up the full range of its activities. There are two outstanding sets of implementing regulations yet to be agreed and two member states have yet to notify ratification of one of the protocols to the Convention.

Once Europol is fully up and running, our law enforcement agencies will, through the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS), make full use of the criminal intelligence analysis facilities Europol offers. In the meantime, information exchange takes place between the NCIS and United Kingdom liaison officers based at Europol's predecessor the Europol Drugs Unit (EDU).

Article 2 of the Europol Convention sets out the objectives of Europol and Article 3 its tasks. Article 10 and related regulations, all of which have been deposited for scrutiny, set out the circumstances in which data will be collected, processed, used and exchanged. Europol will be able to store only data that are necessary to enable it to carry out its remit. In the case of personal data, prior permission will be needed from Europol's Management Board and from Europol's Independent Data Protection Authority before such data can be collected and stored in an analysis file.

The assessment of information and intelligence relating to serious criminal activity in the United Kingdom is the responsibility of NCIS.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the planned level of involvement of Europol in internal EU fraud investigations. [75054]

Kate Hoey: Europol's remit does not at present extend to fraud. As far as I am aware, no proposals have been made for Europol to become involved in internal European Union fraud investigations.

Local Crime and Disorder Strategies

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedures he has established to ensure that local crime and disorder strategies will be monitored, evaluated and audited for evidence of success; and if he will make a statement. [75247]

Mr. Boateng: The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 requires the responsible authorities—the police and local authorities—to review progress against objectives and targets set in their strategies so as to monitor effectiveness. My Department will continue to work with the Audit Commission, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary and other key partners to support the local crime and disorder reduction partnerships in their vital work.

Community Orders

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of community orders were completed successfully at the latest date for which figures are available, and what were the relevant targets of his Department. [75241]

Mr. George Howarth: The table gives provisional results from 1997, shown against targets for 1997–98. While completions will continue to be collected and published, they are no longer key performance indicators and there are no current targets.

Per cent.

	1997–98 target: to achieve the following completion rates within the framework of the enforcement requirements of National Standards	1997 results (provisional)
Probation order	82	85
Community service order	80	78
Supervision order	80	85
Combination order	80	79

Reconviction Rates

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what were the (i) predicted and (ii) actual reconviction rates for persons sentenced to (a) prison and (b) community orders over the last two years for which figures are available; [75240]

(2) what was the two year reconviction rate, with adjustments for pseudo-reconvictions, for (a) community service orders, (b) probation orders, (c) probation centre with specific activities orders, (d) combination orders and (e) imprisonment at the latest date for which figures are available. [75239]

Mr. George Howarth: The most recent available information relates to samples of offenders commencing community penalties or discharged from custody in 1994 and in the first quarter of 1995. Results of a comparison between reconviction rates for the two types of disposal were reported in paragraphs 9.25 to 9.27 in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales, 1997".

The following table contains actual and predicted reconviction rates (within two years of commencement of order or discharge from prison) that were used in this analysis:

	Community penalties[1]	Custody
1994
Actual reconviction rate within two years	54	56
Predicted rate[2]	53	59
Actual-Predicted	1	−3
1995 (1st quarter)
Actual reconviction rate within two years	56	55
Predicted rate[2]	54	58
Actual-Predicted	2	−3

[1] Probation, community service and combination orders

[2] Predicted on the basis of a prediction model applied to community penalty and custody results for a year

The differences between actual and predicted rates do not take account of effect of pseudo-reconvictions. After allowing for the influence of pseudo-reconvictions (effectively a four percentage point adjustment in favour of community penalties) the difference between reconviction rates for those commencing orders or discharged from prison in 1994 was, using unrounded percentages, 0.1 percentage points in favour of custody. This suggests there is currently no discernible difference between reconviction rates for custody and community penalties. The difference for the 1995 samples indicates a similar picture with a difference in favour of custody of one percentage point after the adjustment for predicted rates and pseudo-reconvictions had been made.

The two year reconviction rates for different types of community order and imprisonment are as follows:

	Actual reconviction rate within two years	Rate adjusted for pseudo-reconvictions
1994
Community service—service order	48	41
Probation with probation centre or specified activity requirement	62	57
Other probation	58	52
Combination order	60	55
Custody	56	54
1995 (1st quarter)
Community service—service order	51	44
Probation with probation centre or specified activity requirement	62	57
Other probation	58	52
Combination order	60	55
Custody	55	53

Community Safety

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what initiatives his Department is undertaking to ensure that other Government departments are identifying areas where they can improve community safety and reduce crime; and if he will make a statement. [75245]

Mr. Boateng: We are working with the Departments of Health and for Education and Employment to produce guidance on how the services for which they are responsible can make a constructive contribution to the work of local crime and disorder reduction partnerships. We will consider what more can be done to ensure that all Departments take account of community safety.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the Audit Commission report Safety in Numbers, Promoting Community Safety. [75244]

Mr. Boateng: I welcome the Audit Commission report; it provides a valuable analysis of progress to date and we are studying carefully the recommendations which it contains. We have worked closely with the Audit Commission and other key partners in developing the local crime and disorder reduction partnerships. We intend to continue that co-operation so as to ensure that the initiative is effective.

Police (Civilian Staff)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (i) civilian staff and (ii) traffic wardens were employed in each police force area on (a) the last date for which figures are available and (b) 31 March 1997. [75246]

Mr. Boateng: The latest available information is set out in the table.

Crime (Costs)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate his Department has made of the annual total cost of crime in each region of England and Wales, and in total in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [75338]

Mr. Boateng: No single measure of the total cost of crime currently exists for England and Wales. But within the context of the crime reduction programme, the Home Office is currently working to develop an estimate of the cost of crime, including the full costs to the victim.

Outside Consultants

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State fo the Home Department if he will list the number of times since 1 May 1997 that his Department has employed outside consultants indicating in each case (a) the task and (b) the cost of the contract. [75449]

Mr. Straw: Information on the number of times since 1 May 1997 that the Department has employed outside consultants, the tasks they undertook and the cost of each contract is not recorded centrally and could be obtained at short notice only at disproportionate cost.

However, a planned exercise will take place in April this year to gather information on the Department's use of consultants and it is expected that the data will be available during May. I will place this information in the Library when it is available, and will write to the hon. Member at the same time.

Lighter Fuel Refills

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what age limit he proposes to introduce for the purchase of lighter fuel refills; [75469]

(2) when he proposes to announce new regulations covering the sale of lighter fuel refills. [75468]

Mr. George Howarth: We are still considering the responses to the consultation paper on sales of gas lighter refills.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what publicity he plans to produce on the dangers of lighter fuel refills; and if he will make a statement. [75470]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

The Health Education Authority includes information on the risk of volatile substance abuse, including lighter refills, in its general publicity material and information leaflets on drugs misuse.

In addition, it is planning a publicity campaign targeted at retailers to raise awareness of the issue of volatile substance abuse. It will also inform retailers of their legal responsibilities when selling products that could be used for the purpose of volatile substance abuse.

Wheel Clampers

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to regulate wheel clampers; and if he will make a statement. [75259]

Mr. Boateng: In the transport White Paper "A new deal for Transport; Better for Everyone", we announced our intention to introduce regulation of wheel clamping on private land as part of a package of statutory measures to regulate the private security industry as a whole. I intend to bring forward firm proposals for regulating the private security industry, and will be making an announcement to that effect soon.

Immigration

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to acknowledge the application of Mrs. Devi Singh-Clark for a residence visa on 16 November 1998 and to return her and her husband's passports. [75645]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I regret that we are unable to identify the application of Mrs. Devi Singh-Clark from the details supplied by the hon. Member. If the hon. Member wishes to write to me giving Mrs. Devi Singh-Clark's date of birth and nationality and, if possible, her Home Office reference number, I will be able to provide him with the information requested.

Deaths in Custody

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the procedure for disclosure in inquest cases to take account of the recommendations in the Annual Report of the Police Complaints Authority 1995–96 regarding deaths in police custody and the recommendations of the Parliamentary Ombudsman in the case of Kenneth Severin (C993/97 and A27/99). [75884]

Mr. Boateng: Guidance is shortly to be issued to Chief Officers of Police about the disclosure of documentary evidence to interested parties in advance of inquest hearings which concern deaths in police custody. The guidance advises that disclosure should be normal practice in all cases of deaths in police custody, as well as deaths arising from fatal road crashes involving the police.

The Prison Service has reviewed its practice in relation to investigations into deaths in prison custody, as a result of which it proposes to investigate any death occurring after 1 April 1999 on the basis of disclosure, before the inquest, to those whom the Coroner believes to have a proper interest in preparing for it.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review whether the policy of the Prison Service in relation to disclosure of internal inquiry reports is in accordance with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information; and if he will make a statement. [75890]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service has reviewed its practice in relation to investigations into deaths in prison custody, as a result of which it proposes to investigate any death occurring on or after 1 April on the basis of disclosure, before the inquest, to those whom the Coroner believes to have a proper interest in preparing for it. This disclosure must not, of course, compromise the inquest or any criminal proceeding or infringe the legal rights of witnesses. Each case will be reviewed in accordance with the code.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will release to the family of the deceased the internal Prison Service inquiry report into the recent death at HMP Belmarsh of Peter Knox. [75892]

Mr. George Howarth: The report has been received by the director of dispersal prisons, who commissioned it. He will review the family's request under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, and in consultation with the Coroner. Members of the family have met the senior investigating officer who carried out this investigation. She has passed their specific concerns to the director.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Prisons Ombudsman regarding complaints about deaths in prison custody and the rights of a deceased person's family; and if he will make a statement. [75893]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prisons Ombudsman meets Home Office Ministers on a regular basis to discuss a range of issues. An internal Home Office review, which reported in November 1998, considered whether the Prisons Ombudsman's terms of reference should be extended to include the investigation of complaints relating to deaths in prison custody. The report recommended that a decision on this issue should be deferred until the Prison Service had established its policy on the disclosure of its internal investigation reports.

A protocol allowing pre-inquest disclosure of investigation reports to properly interested parties is to be introduced on 1 April. We intend to reconsider whether the Prisons Ombudsman's remit should include deaths in custody once the impact of this protocol has been properly assessed.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he has taken or proposes to take following the publication of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration's reports (C993/97 and A27/99) on his investigation into the complaint from the family of the late Kenneth Severin. [75889]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service has accepted the criticisms made by the Parliamentary Commissioner (Reports C993/97 and A27/99). In his reports, the Commissioner acknowledges the improvements in procedures which were made in the light of the three tragic deaths following restraint which occurred in 1995. Good progress has been made both locally and nationally by the Prison Service in improving control and restraint procedures, and improvements have been made at Belmarsh. I wish to acknowledge the contribution which the Parliamentary Commissioner's investigation and report has made to these.

The Prison Service has accepted the Commissioner's judgment that the internal investigation report into Mr. Severin's death should now be made available to the family.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he has taken following his meeting with the hon. Members for Erith and Thamesmead and for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) on 21 July 1998 concerning the deaths of Kenneth Severin, Alton Manning and Dennis Stevens. [75891]

Mr. George Howarth: My right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), the then Minister with responsibility for prisons and probation, met with the hon. Members for Erith and Thamesmead and for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) on 21 July 1998 to discuss their concerns about the deaths of Kenneth Severin, Alton Manning and Dennis Stevens. Since that meeting, the Prison Service has continued to work on a range of measures to improve control and restraint training, investigations into deaths in prison custody and the handling of relatives following a death.

A full review of policy on control and restraint procedures was carried out last year. A revised training syllabus for basic training is nearing completion which reinforces instructions that officers will release prisoners from restraint holds as quickly as possible. Improved monitoring and auditing of the use of force will be adopted by the introduction of a new Prison Service Order on the use of force, which is shortly to be issued.

In the autumn of last year, a Prison Service instruction was issued reinforcing standardised procedures to be adopted in investigations into deaths in custody. At the same time, a Prison Service Order was issued outlining guidance and good practice in the sensitive handling of bereaved relatives during the traumatic aftermath of a death in custody. This work will continue with moves towards greater openness in pre-inquest disclosure of information to families from 1 April this year.

Following the recent decision by the Crown Prosecution Service that no charges should be laid in connection with the death of Mr. Alton Manning at Blakenhurst in 1995, the Prison Service has commissioned an investigation as to the reinstatement or revocation of the certification of the prison custody officers involved.

The death of Mr. Dennis Stevens at Dartmoor in 1995 is under investigation by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration following a complaint by Inquest on behalf of the family.

Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if (a) he and (b) his officials had seen a copy of the edition of The Sunday Telegraph of 21 February containing a number of paragraphs from the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry report before he sought an injunction against that paper; and if he will make a statement. [75819]

Mr. Straw: No. Neither I nor my officials had seen a copy of The Sunday Telegraph of 21 February before I sought an injunction against that paper. I explained the circumstances and the information available to me, which led me to seek an injunction, in my oral statement to the House on 22 February 1999, Official Report, columns 21–34.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what time on 20 February he informed the Minister of State, Home Office, the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), that he intended to seek an injunction against The Sunday Telegraph; and if he will make a statement. [75817]

Mr. Straw: The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), was informed by a Private Secretary at around 8.30pm on Saturday 20 February that I intended to seek an injunction against The Sunday Telegraph.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what time on 20 February he informed the Prime Minister's Office he intended to seek an injunction against The Sunday Telegraph; and if he will make a statement. [75816]

Mr. Straw: The Prime Minister's Office was informed around 7pm on Saturday 20 February that I intended to seek an injunction against The Sunday Telegraph.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department at what time on 20 February he applied for an injunction against The Sunday Telegraph; and if he will make a statement. [75818]

Mr. Straw: The application was made by telephone by Counsel acting on my behalf between 8pm and 8.15pm on the evening of Saturday 20 February. I made an oral statement to the House on 22 February 1999, Official Report, columns 21–34.

Mentally Ill Offenders

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of offenders in each year for the last 10 years for which figures are available who have been directed under section 39 of the Mental Health Act 1983 for appropriate hospital treatment but have remained in prison. [74798]

Mr. George Howarth: The available information relates to receptions of persons into prisons in England and Wales under section 37 of the Mental Health Act 1983, and is given in the table.

Mrs. D. J. L. Sidey

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will ensure the return to Mrs. D. J. L. Sidey of 4 Hoskings Court, Strode Road, Buckfastleigh, South Devon TQ11 0PF, before the end of March of her passports currently at Lunar House, Croydon, including her old Chinese passport No. 2041144; [75205]

(2) if he will ensure that, when Mrs. D. J. L. Sidey of 4 Hoskings Court, Strode Road, Buckfastleigh, South Devon TQ11 0PF, receives her new passport from the Immigration and Nationality Department it is endorsed with the grant of indefinite leave to remain. [75204]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Mrs. Sidey's new and expired passports were returned to her on 1 March 1999 unendorsed, as requested in the letter of 5 February 1999.

Prisoners (Drug and Alcohol Rehabilitation)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the (a) nature, (b) content and (c) success rate of (i) alcoholism and (ii) drug rehabilitation programmes for prisoners. [74799]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service currently provides a range of rehabilitation programmes applicable to both drug and alcohol addiction. These include Minnesota 12-step, cognitive behavioural and relapse prevention programmes, in addition to longer-term therapeutic communities.

Although the programmes vary in structure, content and delivery, they all incorporate educational and counselling group-work forms of therapy. Community drug agencies are involved in the development and delivery of all drug rehabilitation programmes and work in partnership with prison staff.

Independent evaluation of the first tranche of drug rehabilitation programmes found completion rates to be broadly comparable to those achieved in the community. The Prison Service requires all rehabilitation programmes to gain central accreditation by April 2002 and, over the next three years, will commission independent research to assess the longer-term effects of rehabilitation upon offending and drug misuse.

Prison Medical Service

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish the joint report with the Health Department on the Prison Medical Service. [74800]

Mr. George Howarth: Department of Health and Home Office Ministers have been considering carefully the review's findings and recommendations, in consultation with other Ministers with an interest. I anticipate the Government will be in a position to make an announcement and publish the report shortly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what estimate he has made of the number of prison medical officers and doctors needed by the Prison Service with a diploma in psychiatric medicine or a more advanced qualification; [74802]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of appropriately qualified prison medical officers needed for the Service; and if he will make a statement. [74804]

Mr. George Howarth: About 230 full-time or part-time doctors currently provide primary care in Prison Service establishments. There are 25 vacancies. The most recent survey indicates that at least 20 doctors have a postgraduate qualification in psychiatric medicine.

The issues of organisation, staffing and qualifications of staff working in prison health care are among those considered by a joint Prison Service and NHS Executive Working Group. The Group's Report is currently under consideration by the Government, and it is planned to publish the Report and to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have gained the Nottingham University Diploma in Prison Medicine since its inception; and what proportion of diploma holders are currently working in the Prison Service. [74803]

Mr. George Howarth: Nine prison doctors have graduated in the two-year Diploma in Prison Medicine since it started at the University of Nottingham in 1996. I was present when they all graduated in December 1998. They are all currently in the employment of the Prison Service.

Prisoners (NHS Hospitals)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners (a) on remand and (b) sentenced are awaiting transfer to an NHS hospital. [74801]

Mr. George Howarth: On 4 March 1999, the Mental Health Unit of the Home Office, which authorises transfers to hospital exercising the warrant of the Secretary of State, had 20 cases of remand prisoners on which medical reports had been submitted by prisons recommending transfer to hospital under section 48 of the Mental Health Act 1983. On the same date, the Unit also had 18 cases of sentenced prisoners on whom medical reports had been submitted by prisons recommending transfer to hospital under section 47 of the Mental Health Act 1983.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75870]

Mr. Straw: Apart from the transcripts of evidence given by Ministers and officials, and embargoed copies of reports supplied in the normal way by Select Committees under House of Commons Standing Orders, there have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge, have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department.

Task Forces

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) reviews, (b) task forces and (c) advisory groups have been established by his Department since 1 May 1997; what costs they have incurred to date; and what reports they have published. [71509]

Mr. Straw [pursuant to his reply, 25 February 1999, c. 383–88]: I should like to update the information provided on Task Forces and Reviews, established by my Department since 1 May 1997. Some other, previous inaccuracies have also been corrected.

Paramilitary Violence

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) of 4 February 1999, Official Report, columns 698–702, if she will set out the circumstances of the deaths in 1998 due to the security situation. [74009]

Mr. Ingram: Of the 17 deaths attributed to loyalists: three were the Quinn children, who died as a result of a petrol bomb attack upon their home; one was a police officer, who died as a result of injuries received in a blast bomb attack; one person was murdered by Loyalist prisoners whilst on remand for terrorist offences; and the remaining twelve victims all died as a result of shooting incidents.

Of the 37 deaths attributed to Republicans, twenty-nine were as a result of the Omagh bombing and eight died as a result of shooting incidents.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if she will list for the week ended 27 February the number of (a) punishment beatings and (b) punishment shootings which took place in Northern Ireland indicating how many in each category were committed by (i) Loyalist and (ii) Republican groups; [75270]

(2) if she will list for the week ended 27 February the number of violent incidents involving paramilitary groups which took place in Northern Ireland and indicate how many involved (i) Loyalist and (ii) Republican groups. [75269]

Mr. Ingram: The numbers of security incidents during the period 21 February-27 February are shown.

Shooting incidents: Nil

Bombing incidents: One.

The numbers of casualties as a result of paramilitary-style attacks during the period are as follows:

	Loyalist	Republican
Shootings	0	0
Total	2	1

Human Rights Commission

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the outgoing Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights applied for membership of the new Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission; and how many were successful. [75142]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Nine members of the outgoing Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights applied for a Commissioner post in the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission and two were successful.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evidence on the statutory requirement regarding representatives in section 53 (3) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 was put before her relating to the list of candidates submitted to her from which to make the selection of Northern Ireland Human Rights Commissioners. [75147]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Of the 154 applicants 23 were interviewed, and the recommendations of the panel were submitted to the Secretary of State. The recommendations took into account the applicants' performance against the key criteria identified for the appointments and the requirements for the Commissioners, as a group, to be representative of the community in Northern Ireland.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland who were the members of the interview panels for the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission; and how many names were submitted to herself. [75140]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The panel that interviewed candidates for the Chief Commissioner post was chaired by Mr. J. Pilling and that for the other Commissioners by Mr. W. Jeffrey. The other panel members in both cases were Mr. G. Loughran and Mrs. J. Eve. The panels submitted their recommendations on all of those interviewed, 8 in the case of Chief Commissioner and 23 for Commission members.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for membership of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission were solicited by her Department; how many of these applications were successful; and how many of the members were proposed or endorsed by outside bodies. [75141]

Mr. Paul Murphy: No candidates for Commissioner posts were solicited by the Department. Five candidates were endorsed by the Irish Government; of those, two were successful. All candidates completed the same application form and all were appointed on merit.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what basis she determined that the members of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission as a group are representative of the community in Northern Ireland. [75146]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The recommendations of the interview panels were submitted to the Secretary of State. These took into account the applicants' performance against the key criteria identified for the appointment and the requirement for the Commission, as a group, to be representative of the community in Northern Ireland.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the members of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission recorded themselves as being or having been members of (a) the SDLP, (b) the Ulster Unionist Party and (c) the Democratic Unionist Party. [75143]

Mr. Paul Murphy: All applicants for the posts of Commissioners were asked to record their political activity over the past 10 years. One member was declared to have been a member of the SDLP, none of the UUP and none of the DUP.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the members of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission are legally qualified. [75144]

Mr. Paul Murphy: 66 per cent. of the members of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission hold legal qualifications.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of (a) the applicants for and (b) those appointed to membership of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission were recorded as (a) Protestants, (b) Roman Catholics and (c) neither. [75145]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Of the 154 applicants 47 per cent. were recorded as Protestant, 47 per cent. Catholic and 6 per cent. as neither. The religious background of individual candidates is established for monitoring purposes only. It is not the Government's policy to release the affiliation of each member, but we are satisfied that the Commissioners, as a group, are representative of the community in Northern Ireland.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many application forms were issued for membership of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission; how many were returned completed; and how many candidates were shortlisted and interviewed. [75139]

Mr. Paul Murphy: 283 forms were issued, 154 completed and returned and 23 candidates were shortlisted and interviewed.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make it her policy to ensure that members of the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission display in statements and external public activities the political detachment specified in the job description details provided to applicants for membership of the Commission. [75148]

Mr. Paul Murphy: An extract from the Guidance in Public Appointments in Northern Ireland was included in the information pack for all candidates; it states that "members of public bodies should not serve as officers carrying out executive duties in any political party".

Stricter limitations apply to full-time members. This guidance is based upon Government policy.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the human rights commissions were established in (a) the Republic of Ireland and (b) Northern Ireland; and if she will make a statement on the implementation of the human rights section of the Belfast Agreement. [75046]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission was established on 1 March 1999. This is the central feature of the additional protections for human rights in Northern Ireland envisaged in the Belfast Agreement. I understand that the Irish Government are preparing legislation to establish a human rights commission in the Republic of Ireland.

Belfast Agreement

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will work to ensure the implementation of the entire Belfast Agreement by all participating Governments and political parties. [75086]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Belfast Agreement must be implemented in full. That is the Government's objective and we will work with all the parties and with the Irish Government to ensure that this objective is achieved. We are living up to all our commitments under the Agreement and it is essential that every other party does likewise.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the Republic of Ireland has taken, as a signatory to the Belfast Agreement, to demonstrate its respect for the different traditions in the island of Ireland since 10 April 1998; and if she will make a statement. [75042]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I understand the Irish Government have taken a number of steps to demonstrate its respect for the different traditions in the island of Ireland. The Irish Minister for Foreign Affairs has established an Interdepartmental Committee with the task of bringing forward proposals for the development of the site of the Battle of the Boyne. This will be a major project and is expected to be part of the Republic's Millennium Programme. In addition, the Irish Government contributed £150,000 towards the building of a memorial in Messines in Belgium in honour of Irish soldiers from both traditions who died in World War I.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Republic of Ireland introduced the equal status legislation required under the Belfast Agreement; and if she will make a statement. [75043]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I understand that it is the intention of the Irish Government to publish an Equal Status Bill before the end of the Dáil's Easter recess.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress the Republic of Ireland has made in implementing the enhanced employment equality legislation required under the Belfast Agreement; and if she will make a statement. [75044]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I understand that the Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform announced on 8 March a new infrastructure for equality which will comprise an Equality Authority and an Office of Equality Investigations. In addition, I understand that he has appointed the members of the Equality Authority Designate. An Employment Equality Act was enacted last year and a target date of 1 September 1999 has been set for its complete implementation.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Republic of Ireland ratified the Council of Europe Framework Convention on National Minorities; and if she will make a statement about the implementation of this section of the Belfast Agreement. [75045]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I understand the Irish Cabinet recently approved proposals for the ratification of the Council of Europe Framework Convention on National Minorities. These proposes will be debated shortly in Dáil Eireann and formal ratification will take place immediately afterwards.

Fisheries Conservancy Board

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the members of the Northern Ireland Fisheries Conservancy Board; on what date each was appointed; on what date each is due to retire from membership of the Board; if on the basis of attendance at board meetings, all existing members comply with the requirements of membership; and if she will make a statement. [75053]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The current members of the Fisheries Conservancy Board for Northern Ireland and their appointment and cessation dates are set out in the table. The table includes a list of vacant posts which will be filled during April 1999.

The attendance of one current member at meetings of the Board is in breach of the requirements of Schedule 2 of the Fisheries Act (NI) 1966. This matter is being pursued and an explanation has been sought from the member for his non-attendance.

Police Complaints

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current staffing of (a) the Independent Commission for Police Complaints and (b) the RUC's Complaints and Discipline Department; and what is the planned staffing for the Police Ombudsman's Office. [74568]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The Independent Commission for Police Complaints currently has 17[1] members of staff and a full time Chairman and deputy Chairman and five part time members. The RUC's Complaints and Discipline Department has 115[2] staff. The Government's initial estimate, produced for the purpose of advertising the post of Police Ombudsman, is a staff of about 60. The precise figure is being considered in working groups which include my officials and representatives of the RUC and the Independent Commission for Police Complaints. In addition, we will be consulting the Police Ombudsman when appointed.

[1] (this includes a job share post)

[2] (this includes an ACC who covers two departments and officers temporarily seconded to assist with particular investigations)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the annual financing of (a) the Police Ombudsman's Office, (b) the Complaints and Discipline Department of the RUC and (c) the Independent Commission for Police Complaints for the next three years. [74567]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The available information is as follows. The Independent Commission for Police Complaints is to be replaced by the Police Ombudsman's Office and, therefore, there is no forecast for the next three years. The current budget for the Independent Commission for Police Complaints is £883,000.

Although a figure of £3 million has been produced for the Police Ombudsman's office, this was a preliminary estimate for the advertisement of the post of Police Ombudsman. The precise budget of the Police Ombudsman has still to be determined, as have the financial implications of the changes on the Complaints and Discipline Department. (Figures for it were given in answer to my hon. Friend on 25 February 1999, Official Report, column 360.) Both matters are being considered in working groups which include my officials and representatives from the RUC, the Independent Commission for Police Complaints and the Police Authority for Northern Ireland.

The Government have made it clear that they are committed to making the necessary resources available for the office of Police Ombudsman.

TREASURY

Securities Legislation

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes he intends to make to the Public Offers of Securities Regulations 1995 and the Companies Act 1985 following the consultation on securities legislation announced on 20 August 1998; and if he will make a statement. [76235]

Ms Hewitt: The Treasury had today made Statutory Instruments amending the Public Offers of Securities Regulations 1995 and commencing certain repeals of provisions in the Companies Act 1985. It is intended that these changes will have effect from 10 May 1999.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the report on Information Requirements in Economic and Monetary Union, as agreed by Ecofin, with regard to its effects on the operation of statistical research in the United Kingdom; what effect the changes in Intrastat will have on the figures for imports and exports between the United Kingdom and the rest of the EU; and what the operational costs of the changes will be. [75057]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. David Maclean, dated 10 March 1999:

In the absence of the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question regarding the Report on Information Requirements in Economic and Monetary Union.

The ONS welcomes the recommendations in the report, which are in line with the priorities and work programmes of the UK, other Member States and the Commission/Eurostat.

The UK already produces quarterly national accounts, public finance statistics and most short-term statistics in line with the Economic and Financial Committee (EFC) recommendations. Work is in hand to meet requirements for labour market statistics.

Officials at HM Customs and Excise have provided the following information on the changes in Intrastat. The changes proposed for Instrastat would reduce the level of detail currently required on arrivals and dispatches between Member States participating in the euro-area. This would, in principle, allow the present Instrastat system to be simplified and other methods explored to arrive at a suitable output. It is not possible at this stage to say what impact such simplifications might have on the statistics of UK trade with the rest of Europe or what the cost of such changes would be. However, the proposed simplifications are intended to meet the needs of users of information at a European level—many other users, including the UK government and UK business, are likely to continue to need detailed UK trade data. The needs of these users, and of the providers of this data, will be fully taken into account when changes to Intrastat are discussed.

The ONS has in place a system of announcing in advance the release of key statistical outputs. This is in line with the EFC recommendations.

Winter Deaths

Dr. Godman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will breakdown the excess winter deaths in England and Wales for each of the last three years by socio-economic class, indicating (a) all ages, (b) those aged 60 to 70 years and (c) those aged 70 years and over. [75451]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 10 March 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the breakdown of excess winter deaths.

The information requested is shown in the attached table.

Excess winter deaths are defined as the difference between the number of deaths during the four winter months (December to March) and the average number of deaths during the preceding autumn (August to November) and the following summer (April to July).

Social Class of the deceased is not available for deaths to those aged over 75. However, around 75 per cent. of excess winter deaths occur in this age group. Children under 16 can be assigned to a Social Class at death on the basis of their parent(s) occupation. Deaths in this age group have been excluded. Figures are shown separately for men and women as the distribution of deaths by Social Class differs markedly; this is because occupation is poorly recorded for women at death registration.

District Nurses

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many district nurses were assigned to each health authority for each month in 1997 and 1998. [73479]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not collected on a monthly basis. The table shows the numbers of district nurses in post by health authority area in England as at 30 September 1997. Information for 1998 is not yet available.

Midwives

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many qualified midwives were employed in the NHS in each of the last 20 years. [73478]

Notes:
1. Figures are rounded to nearest ten.
2. Figures exclude learners and agency staff.
3. Data for years prior to 1982 relate to December, while those for subsequent years are staff in post on September 30.
4. The number of full-time hours was reduced from 40 to 37.5 during 1980 and the 37.5 hour week became mandatory on 31 March 1981. This means that figures for whole time equivalents before 1980 are not directly comparable with those for subsequent years.
5. Due to a change in classification in 1995 for collecting data, from pay scale to occupation code, 1995, 1996 and 1997 figures are non-comparable with earlier years.
6. From 1995, figures for qualified midwives include midwives teaching midwifery and managers in the maternity services area of work. Managers may be a nurse, midwife or health visitor who has overall responsibility for budgets, manpower or assets, or who is held accountable for a significant area of work, and who has little or no direct clinical involvement.

Ambulances (Accidents)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been (a) injured and (b) killed in each year since 1990 as a result of an accident involving an ambulance answering a 999 call. [74629]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) acute, (b) geriatric, (c) mental illness, (d) learning disability and (e) maternity beds each health authority had in each year since 1994–95. [75039]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Cardiac Rehabilitation Courses

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the current waiting time for cardiac rehabilitation courses for each health trust; [75208]

(2) if he will list the health trusts in England which provide cardiac rehabilitation programmes for people aged (a) 65 to 70, (b) 70 to 80 and (c) over 80 years. [75529]

Mr. Hutton: Information is not held centrally about either the waiting times or scope of individual cardiac rehabilitation programmes. There is evidence that there is considerable variation in the service provided around the country and this is one of the areas to be addressed by the National Service Framework for coronary heart disease.

Residential and Nursing Care

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to end anomalies arising from preserved rights in the residential and nursing care sectors; and if he will make a statement. [75231]

Mr. Hutton: We are looking at this issue along with other recommendations in the report of the Royal Commission on Long-Term Care.

Smoking-related Diseases

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of people who suffered from smoking-related diseases in each of the last five years. [75459]

Ms Jowell: The latest figures available in "The UK Smoking Epidemic: Deaths in 1995", by the Health Education Authority, estimate that at least 121,000 people died as a result of their smoking in United Kingdom in 1995. Comparable figures are not available for earlier years.

No-smoking Areas

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to impose a legal duty on restaurants to provide non-smoking areas. [75458]

Ms Jowell: No. We gave careful thought to the legislative option, but concluded that voluntary commitments by the industry were more likely to be implemented effectively and with public support. The White Paper "Smoking Kills" includes a new charter on smoking in public places, agreed by the hospitality industry. The results will be monitored and we will consider the need for any further action in the light of progress.

Paracetamol Poisoning

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were admitted to accident and emergency departments suffering from paracetamol poisoning in each year since 1996–97. [75013]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Available information is given in the table. Poisonings by paracetamol are not separately identified.

Health Awareness

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase health awareness among men. [75304]

Ms Jowell: The Department recognises that the specific health needs of men are an important part of the overall strategy on the nation's health, and factors affecting men's health were highlighted in the recently published report of the "Independent Inquiry into Health Inequalities" led by Sir Donald Acheson.

The White Paper "Our Healthier Nation" setting out our health strategy, to be published in the Spring, will acknowledge the high levels of avoidable illness and premature death found among men, and the need for men to improve and prolong an active and healthy life. The Department will also continue to fund projects that aim to raise awareness of health issues which are specific to men.

Long-term Care

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost of implementing the recommendations in the report by the Royal Commission on Long Term Care for a National Care Commission. [75492]

Mr. Hutton: We are currently looking at all the recommendations made by the Royal Commission and will be drawing up costings where necessary as part of that process.

Forensic Psychiatrists

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are currently training to be forensic psychiatrists; and what estimate has been made of the numbers needed to provide appropriate treatment for those for whom it is considered relevant. [74805]

Mr. Denham: The Departmental medical and dental work force census shows about a 100 hospital medical staff in forensic psychiatry training grades in England at 30 September 1997. The Specialty Workforce Advisory Group advises Ministers on the numbers needed in higher specialist training in forensic psychiatry so as to provide fully-trained doctors to fill consultant posts in the future. In estimating likely future requirements for higher specialist trainees, it seeks views from the National Health Service on local pressures and service developments and consults the medical profession.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each of the completed Private Finance Initiative projects worth over £1 million, (a) how long the delay was for those not completed on time, (b) the extent of any revisions to the contractual payments, and (c) how long any disputes about the quality of the work took to resolve. [75742]

Mr. Denham: No private finance initiative scheme with a capital value of greater than £10 million has yet been completed. Details of individual schemes with a capital cost of less than £10 million are not held centrally.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by region the number, individual value and total value of Private Finance Initiative bids worth less than £1 million in each of the last five years. [75778]

Mr. Denham: Details on individual schemes with a capital cost of less than £10 million are not held centrally.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all the projects milestones for each of the major acute sector hospital PFI schemes selected to continue towards financial close under the first prioritisation exercise, as agreed at the point of signature, indicating for each (a) in what respects any of these milestones have not been met, (b) the steps he is taking to remedy this, and (c) the assessment he has made of whether the completion dates for each of these projects will be met. [75776]

Mr. Denham: Of the 15 major private finance initiative schemes selected to proceed under the first prioritisation exercise, 10 have reached financial close and have signed contracts with a private sector partner. The remaining project milestone for these schemes is the completion date (when construction is completed and the facility is fully operational). These are:

Scheme	Completion due
Bromley	November 2002
Calderdale	May 2001
Carlisle	May 2000
Dartford and Gravesham	September 2000
Greenwich	May 2001
Norfolk and Norwich	January 2002
North Durham	November 2001
South Buckinghamshire:
—Wycombe site	January 2000
—Amersham site	August 2000
Wellhouse	April 2002
South Manchester	February 2001

All the schemes in the table are on target to achieve their due completion date and we are not aware of any that have failed to meet significant internal project milestones.

Clinical Waste Incinerators

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each of the last five years the independent contractors who have made successful bids for clinical waste incinerators for NHS hospitals. [75777]

Mr. Denham: No clinical waste incinerator scheme in the National Health Service involving an independent contractor has a capital value of more than £10 million. Details on individual schemes with a capital cost of less than £10 million are not held centrally.

Children (Abuse and Neglect)

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to reduce the number of children suffering from physical abuse and neglect. [75307]

Mr. Hutton: In collaboration with colleagues across Government, I have made protecting children from abuse and neglect a key priority. We have a substantial programme of work under way to help make sure that children are protected from harm and that they are given the best possible start in life. This programme includes:

root and branch reform of the regulation system, introducing checks on the full range of children's care services, and strengthening safeguards;

an extensive range of reforms, set out in the Government's response to the Children's Safeguards Review, to improve the protection of all children living away from home;

Stronger systems for preventing unsuitable people from working with children; and a thorough revision of the Government guidance on child protection to improve the handling of cases where children are suffering, or at risk of suffering, abuse and neglect. The new guidance will also emphasise the importance of agencies working together to help families and children under stress, to help prevent abuse and neglect taking place.

Child protection will also be improved through the three year "Quality Protects" programme to improve local authority children's services. As part of the Quality Protects programme local authorities must take action to bring their child protection services up to standard. They will be required to show how they:

carry out thorough and prompt assessments of children's needs;

have good case records;

draw up and implement child protection plans which are then reviewed regularly; ensure that all children on the child protection register have an allocated social worker; know what outcomes they want for children in need of protection and assess whether these are being achieved; and have a human resource strategy which identifies the skills and knowledge needed by child protection staff.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the number of children under the age of five years who have died following abuse or neglect in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [75306]

Mr. Hutton: Reliable information on the number of children who die following abuse or neglect is not available. Not all such deaths will be recognised and in some cases the cause of death may be unclear or wrongly attributed. Currently, local Area Child Protection Committees are required to review cases which involve an incident leading to the death of a child where child abuse is confirmed or suspected, or a child protection issue arises which is likely to be of major public concern arises. Local authorities are required to inform the Department or the Welsh Office (as appropriate) immediately they become aware of any such case. We are improving the consistency and reliability of information provided through this route by revising the child protection guidance "Working Together Under The Children Act 1989—A guide to arrangements for inter-agency co-operation for the protection of children from abuse" and associated measures.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75876]

Mr. Dobson: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge, have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

MMR Vaccine

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the take-up rate has been for MMR vaccination for the last five years in (a) Manchester, (b) the North West and (c) England. [75674]

Ms Jowell: The information requested is given in the table.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research he intends to conduct into cattle TB during 1999–2000. [76408]

Mr. Rooker: The Krebs review concluded that there is no single solution to the problem of TB in cattle. It made a number of recommendations designed to provide a firm scientific basis for future policy. Many of the recommendations were proposals for further research, and it was these that the Government acted on first. We completely reviewed our TB research programme, and on 20 April last year published a document setting out new research requirements for the year beginning on 1 April 1999. Researchers wishing to participate were invited to submit bids by 3 July. 36 bids were received and were appraised by a panel of internal and external experts from Britain and overseas. A subsequent notice invited bids to analyse TB risk factors. Successful bidders were informed last autumn, and we have since been engaged in negotiations. We hope to sign research contracts shortly.

The new research programme will comprise 19 separate projects and will cost around £3.4 million in 1999/2000, although most of the projects will be carried forward into future years. Many of the projects are integrated into the badger culling trial and epidemiological survey, which take forward other recommendations in the Krebs report and will yield extensive information for analysis.

There are three main strands to the new programme. First, there is work to develop improved control strategies. Although we shall also spend £55,000 on examining the possibility of using bacteriophages to control Mycobacterium bovis in the environment, the most important work here is on vaccine development. This will be undertaken at the Institute of Animal Health and Veterinary Laboratories Agency, with a number of sub-contractors including experts in New Zealand, and will cost £1.4 million. If successful this will also lead to the development of a better test to diagnose TB in live badgers.

Although improved TB vaccines have eluded researchers for many years, recent advances in molecular biology offer new hopes for success. The genome sequencing project which we are co-funding with the Wellcome Trust is a particular example. This work will be taking place at the frontiers of scientific knowledge. It is important that the various projects contributing to the vaccine programme are taken forward together, and that full account is taken of parallel work in other countries [illegible] human medicine. We have therefore appointed Dr. Colston, the Head of Mycobacterial Research at the National Institute for Medical Research, Mill Hill, as external consultant for this programme.

Secondly, there is work to improve our understanding of herd breakdowns. We are reanalysing the information in our existing databases on TB risk factors. We shall develop new transmission models and examine a wide range of possible transmission and risk factors, including a variety of possible wildlife reservoirs of infection other than badgers. We shall be looking at better ways of detecting Mycobacterium bovis in clinical and environmental samples. We shall be developing molecular fingerprinting techniques to categorise Mycobacterium bovis strains more precisely. This work, which will cost £1.5 million in total, will be undertaken in a variety of research institutions in Great Britain, and will also draw in expertise from Northern Ireland, the Netherlands and New Zealand.

Thirdly, we need to examine the role of badgers in TB more closely. We shall be spending £475,000 on work estimating badger numbers, and understanding the role of badgers in disease transmission.

Details of the projects, contractors and costs are being placed in the Library.

Although this programme is extensive and will provide answers to many of the questions identified by the Krebs and Bourne Groups and by people who have written to us, it is not exhaustive. We shall be taking forward a project started in 1998 to use geographical information systems to provide better spatial analyses of TB risk factors, and are currently identifying gaps for new projects which we might be able to finance from next year. We are also consulting external appraisers about a project to be commissioned from the Central Science Laboratory to assess the ecological impact of badger culling.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to sequence the genome of the bacterium which causes TB in cattle; and if he will make a statement. [76407]

Mr. Rooker: I am pleased to announce that MAFF and the Wellcome Trust have recently agreed joint funding for a three-way collaboration between the Veterinary Laboratories Agency, the Sanger Centre and the Institut Pasteur in Paris to sequence the complete genome of Mycobacterium bovis. MAFF's contribution will be around £800,000, payable largely in the current financial year.

This is an exciting and important new development in our fight against the rising tide of TB in cattle. Determining the genetic code for the bacterium which causes cattle TB is undoubtedly the best means of catalysing vaccine research and development. The prospect that by March 2000 we will have a completely defined genome sequence of Mycobacterium bovis, the organism which causes TB in cattle, is very encouraging and represents a major advance.

The time is undoubtedly right for this research to be taken forward. The genome sequence of the human TB strain has already provided valuable leads for vaccine research. Unravelling the secrets of the bovine TB genome is of the highest relevance to the development of an effective cattle vaccine and a diagnostic test which will distinguish between vaccinated and infected animals.

Quarantine

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) which operators of entry points to the United Kingdom have indicated that they would be prepared to (i) carry and (ii) check animals if the quarantine laws are reformed; [75178]

(2) how many operators of entry points to the United Kingdom currently have the necessary facilities to implement the changes to the quarantine laws recommended by Professor Kennedy; [75177]

(3) with which operators of entry points to the UK he has exchanged correspondence or had meetings to discuss reforms to the quarantine laws. [75179]

Mr. Rooker: The Government are considering the outcome of the consultation on the report of the Advisory Group on Quarantine, which recommended changes to the quarantine system.

My officials have held preliminary discussions with operators of those ports and airports in England that Professor Kennedy recommended should be eligible points of entry. These discussions have been for the purpose of identifying appropriate procedures, and determining the scale and cost of facilities that might be required for the movement of qualifying animals through entry points. These discussions have not yet been completed. Discussions have also been held with the British Ports Association and the British Airports Association. We have also corresponded with the Major Ports Group and Eurotunnel Developments Ltd.

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many responses were received during the consultation period on Professor Kennedy's report on quarantine; and of the responses how many were (a) supportive of reforming the quarantine laws and (b) opposed to changing the law. [75175]

Mr. Rooker: During the consultation period, a total of 3,742 responses were received. Some 96 per cent. of respondents expressed overall support for the reforms to quarantine recommended by Professor Kennedy's Group, with 2 per cent. expressing opposition to the changes.

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many responses to Professor Kennedy's report on quarantine were received from ports, airports, rail operators and other travel operators; and of those how many were (a) supportive of reforming the quarantine laws and (b) opposed to changing the law. [75176]

Mr. Rooker: Thirteen responses were received from ports, airports, rail operators and other travel operators. Seven of these responses supported the proposed changes, with the others limiting their comments to specific aspects of the proposals or making practical comments about their implementation. None expressed outright opposition to changing the law.

EU Subsidies

Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what his policy is with regard to the capping of subsidies for cereals and root crops within the EU. [75014]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 9 March 1999]: We are opposed to the capping of subsidies at EU level, as proposed by the European Commission, which would discriminate against UK farmers because of our different farm structure.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what legal advice he has sought to ascertain whether he can introduce an import ban on food that does not meet current standards in terms of genetically modified organism regulations. [75197]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 9 March 1999]: No genetically modified food (GM) may be sold in the UK unless it has been rigorously assessed for safety and is clearly labelled in accordance with the EC Novel Foods and Ingredient Regulation (258/97) or, in the case of soya and maize, EC Regulation 1139/98.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he plans to take to prevent the importation of food that has not been correctly segregated and labelled under genetically modified organism regulations. [75196]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 9 March 1999]: All genetically modified (GM) foods sold in the European Union must be approved for safety and labelled in accordance with EC Novel Foods and Food Ingredients Regulation (258/97), or in the case of GM soya and maize, EC Regulation 1139/98. Responsibility for the enforcement of these regulations lies with local authorities.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the segregation of genetically modified food. [74692]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 27 January 1999, Official Report, column 302.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what independent research he has commissioned on the possibility of genetically modified food crops affecting other crops being grown; and if he will make a statement. [75072]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The Ministry has since 1991 funded a programme of research to assess the risks to agriculture from the release of genetically modified (GM) crops. To date, over £4.1 million has been spent on the programme and the results so far provide no evidence for possible risks to agricultural crops from the release of GM crops.

Quarantine Regulations

Mr. Wood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which organisations were contacted during the consultation process on changes to the quarantine regulations. [73470]

Mr. Rooker: The list of recipients of the consultation letter issued by my Department on 23 September 1998 has been place in the Library of the House. Separate consultations were held by the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Wales.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 11 March 1999

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Admission Charges

Mr. Tyler: To ask the President of the Council if she will ensure that no charges are imposed for admission to the Palace of Westminster which could affect British citizens without a debate and decision on the floor of the House. [75943]

Mrs. Beckett: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), on behalf of the House of Commons Commission, on 3 February 1999, Official Report, column 625.

Contracts

Mr. Love: To ask the Chairman of the Finance and Services Committee what assessment is made of the industrial relations record of private contractors as part of the tendering process for contracts to provide services to the House; and if he will make a statement. [75443]

Dr. Moonie: No formal assessments are made of the industrial relations records of private contractors tendering for contracts to provide services to the House. The supplier appraisal process can, however, cover such matters as recruitment procedures to avoid discrimination, training policies, quality standards and good employment practices.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

River Tigris Dam

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the economic impact on British companies of the bidding process for dam construction on the River Tigris in Turkey. [74873]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The contract is the subject of continuing negotiations and, until these are complete, the actual values will not be known, but the company concerned expects that very substantial procurement of UK goods and services would take place as a result of the Ilisu hydro-electric project on the River Tigris in Turkey.

Internal Market Council

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the Conclusions of the EU Presidency on Economic Reform which were debated at the EU Internal Market Council on 25 February. [75724]

Mr. Wilson: The Conclusions on Economic Reform agreed at the Internal Market Council of 25 February were published as part of a Council press release (document No. 6215/99), following the meeting. They are available on the Council's website at http://ue.eu.int/newsroom/

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the Conclusions of the Internal Market Council on 25 February. [75725]

Mr. Wilson: The Conclusions of the Internal Market Council of 25 February were published as part of a Council press release (document No. 6215/99), following the meeting. They are available on the Council's website at http://ue.eu.int/newsroom/

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the conclusions of his Department's inquiry into the disappearance of weapons grade uranium in the 1960s from Dounreay; and if he will make a statement. [75942]

Mr. Battle: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 28 January 1999, Official Report, column 315, to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

Fifoots Point Power Station

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is yet in a position to make his decision on AES Fifoots Point Ltd's application to extend the Fifoots Point coal-fired power station near Newport in South Wales. [76735]

Mr. Battle: I have today granted consent under Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to AES Fifoots Point Ltd.'s application to construct a re-circulating cooling water system (the extension) at its existing power station at Fifoots Point. The decision has been taken in accordance with the policy set out in the White Paper entitled 'Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee' (Cm 4071).

The relevant planning authority, Newport County Borough Council, has not objected to the application.

Decisions on other applications under consideration will be announced in due course.

Copies of the Press Notice are being placed in the Library of the House.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what discussions he has had with the regional electricity companies to encourage them to use more renewable energy; [75686]

(2) what target, in terms of the percentage of electricity provided through renewables, each of the regional electricity companies has set themselves; and what progress was made in achieving this in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [75687]

Mr. Battle: Orders placed under the Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation (NFFO) arrangements require the Regional Electricity Companies (RECs) to contract collectively for specific amounts of renewable generation.

As an illustration of the progress made to date, in calendar year 1997, NFFO projects supplied 2.63 Terra Watt hours (TWh) of electricity. In calendar year 1998, that rose to 3.29 TWh, an increase of 25 per cent.

In September last year I laid the fifth NFFO Order—NFFO-5—which followed immediately on from a consultation with the RECs. That Order is the largest to date, for a total of 261 projects with a total Declared Net Capacity (DNC) of 1177 Mega Watts (MW).

Missile Purchases

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the total value of missile purchases other than Rapier which the USA has made from the United Kingdom in the past decade. [75018]

Mr. Spellar: I have been asked to reply.

I wrote to the hon. Member about this matter on 8 March 1999, in reply to his earlier question on 2 March 1999, Official Report, columns 659–60, and a copy of my letter has been placed in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prison Service

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what response she has made to the Fourth Report of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee of session 1997–98 on the Prison Service in Northern Ireland. [76587]

Marjorie Mowlam: A copy of my response has, by the Committee's leave, been placed in the Library.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Pilot Projects

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the pilot projects instigated by his Department since 1 May 1997, indicating the area in which each pilot took, or is taking, place. [72633]

Mr. Mudie: Since 1 May 1997 the Department has instigated a number of pilot projects, a list of which has been placed in the Library.

Education Standards Agency

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each (a) metropolitan district council, (b) shire district council, (c) unitary council, (d) shire county council and (e) London borough council the sums of money they will be required to pay towards the education standards fund in the 1999–2000 financial year. [74771]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table lists the allocations offered so far to each local education authority in England for the 1999–2000 Standards Fund programme, including the contribution to be made by each authority and by the Government if the allocations are accepted in full.

The number of individual Standards Fund grants (previously Grants for Education Support and Training) fully funded by the Government has increased from two under Grants for Education Support and Training in 1996–97 to nine so far allocated under the Standards Fund for 1999–2000. The Government's contribution has increased from £163 million to £493 million over the same period.

Independent Committee on Technology in Schools

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the reports he has received from the Independent Committee on Technology in Schools. [74791]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An independent committee chaired by Sir Dennis Stevenson was established in 1996 to examine the role that ICT should be playing in primary and secondary education. The committee published its findings in a report entitled 'Information and Communications Technology in UK Schools'.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each (a) metropolitan district council, (b) shire district council, (c) unitary council, (d) shire county council and (e) London borough council the amount of money they will receive to contribute towards the teachers' pay award in the 1999–2000 financial year. [74770]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Local Government Finance settlement was announced by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister on 2 December 1998, Official Report, columns 883–84. It included Education Standard Spending Assessments, which increased by 5.7 per cent. overall, but it did not identify separately funding in respect of teachers' pay.

Nursery Education

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress in the provision of guaranteed nursery education for all four-year-olds. [74780]

Ms Hodge: Early Years Development and Childcare Plans demonstrate how, since September 1998, a free part time early education place, for three terms before compulsory school, has been available for every child whose parents want one.

Class Sizes

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list by local education authority, how much money (a) has been spent and (b) is estimated will be needed to be spent on (i) employing new teachers and (ii) building new classrooms in order for schools to ensure that no five to seven-year-olds will be in classes with more than 30 pupils. [74736]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table sets out by local education authority the allocations of revenue funding for additional teachers and capital funding for new classrooms made for 1998–99 and 1999–2000. In total, we have made available £620 million to ensure that our pledge is delivered in full by September 2001 and in virtually all schools by September 2000.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for (i) each of the past four years and (ii) the current year to date (a) the number of jobseeker's allowance recipients who have been interviewed and (b) the number subsequently awarded a nil benefit. [74159]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 4 March 1999]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, dated 11 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your question about how many jobseekers, who receive Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA), have been interviewed and how many, subsequently, had nil benefit awards. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

The Employment Service conducts many different types of interviews with jobseekers. These start at the new claims stage and develop as unemployment lengthens. The new jobseeker's interview is important in establishing whether jobseekers meet the labour market conditions for receiving JSA. It is normally at this stage that a Jobseeker's Agreement is drawn up and jobseekers are made aware of their responsibilities in order to receive JSA. Thereafter, entitlement to JSA is reviewed at interviews every fortnight. We also use these opportunities to offer jobseekers further advice and help in their search for work. Jobseekers are also asked to attend a Restart Interview at regular six monthly intervals at which they are offered further advice and information about employment and training opportunities. Beyond this interviews may take place for a variety of other reasons.

Questions about a jobseeker's entitlement to JSA could arise at any of the interviews referred to above. In these instances, there may be a reference to an independent Adjudication Officer for a decision on benefit entitlement.

On the specific issue of nil benefit awards, since JSA was introduced in October 1996, the number of claims processed and the number of nil awards by operational year has been as follows:

	Claims processed	Nil awards
7 October 1996 to 31 March 1997	1,280,960	164,460
1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998	2,966,185	470,047
1 April 1998 to 31 January 1999	2,339,348	403,897

These figures are based primarily on information held by the JSA Payments System. The figures for the period ending 31 March 1997 include a small number of claims held on the income support computer system because they linked back to an earlier Income Support claim.

I hope this is helpful.

Higher Education

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the current ratio of school leavers to the numbers entering higher education. [75024]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information on the number of school leavers who entered higher education directly is not available centrally. In some cases, progression to HE will be direct from FE or tertiary college, and some students will enter after a year abroad or other sabbatical. The entry rate of young people to HE is measured by the Age Participation Index (API) which measures the chance of a young person entering full-time higher education before they are 21. In 1998–99 the API was in the range 30–32 per cent.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many special schools he estimates will close as a result of the Programme of Action for meeting special educational needs. [74814]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Programme of Action makes it clear that we see a continuing and vital role for special schools. We want to build on their strengths and ensure that they are an integral part of an inclusive local education system for children in their area, and in some cases beyond. We recognise that some local education authorities may wish to propose changes to individual schools, both special and mainstream, to reflect changes in demand for special needs provision. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has, however, informed authorities that the Programme of Action should not be interpreted as providing justification on its own for making proposals to close special schools.

Grammar School Ballots

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on Trafford

Borough Council's advice to parent teacher associations regarding the dissemination of information to parents who are involved in grammar school ballots. [75226]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Council's action is not contrary to the provisions in the School Standards and Framework Act 1998. The letter from the Chief Executive merely points out that it would be prudent for parent teacher associations with charitable status to check their constitutions before disseminating any information from lobby groups to ensure that their actions would not be in breach of Charity law.

School Performance Tables

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to reform school performance tables to allow schools to omit from their statistics those children who have been disregarded from SATs and public examinations by virtue of a statement of special educational needs. [75206]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have no current plans to treat pupils with special educational needs differently in performance tables. The inclusion of such pupils is supported by the Government's National Advisory Group on SEN.

Many pupils with special educational needs are academically able or on a par with other pupils, and to ignore their achievements would be wrong. Schools do face particular challenges, however, in achieving results in line with national expectations for most pupils with special educational needs. The performance tables include information on the number of such pupils on roll, so that this can be taken into account in evaluating school performance.

New Deal

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what assessment his Department has made of the improvements in employability of those passing through the New Deal programme; [75421]

(2) allowing for displacement and substitution, what estimate his Department has made of the number of new jobs which have been created by the New Deal; [75422]

(3) what percentage of those going through all stages of the New Deal for the young unemployed to date were without permanent employment at the end of the programme. [75423]

Mr. Andrew Smith: [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Graham Brady, dated 11 March 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply direct to your questions about the New Deal initiative for young people aged between 18 and 24. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The very early evidence from the New Deal suggests that it is having a significant impact on participants' employability. Comparing the pathfinder areas, where the New Deal commenced in January 1998, to the rest of the country, where it commenced in April 1998, the pathfinder areas showed a six percentage point higher flow of young people into jobs between January and April 1998.

In the longer term, as part of the overall evaluation of New Deal, we aim through a national survey of New Deal participants to make an assessment of employability in terms, for example, of improvements in basic skills and qualifications, increased work experience, increased levels of job search activity, increased levels of motivation and confidence about finding work and increased self-esteem. Findings from the first stage of the survey are expected to be available around September 1999; findings from the second stage around September 2000.

Turning to the number of jobs created by the New Deal, I should say that the New Deal was not planned as a job creation initiative. Its aim is to tackle long term unemployment among young people by improving their employability and helping them find jobs.

Finally, in respect of the percentage of young people without permanent employment at the end of their participation in New Deal, I should explain that the New Deal has a number of stages including Gateway, the options and a follow through period of support and guidance. Because New Deal only started nationally in April 1998 it is too early to evaluate what proportion of participants may not secure permanent employment at the end of their time on the programme. It may be helpful, however, to say that by December 1998 of the 214,300 young people who had started New Deal only 4,400 had started on the follow through period.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the progress of the New Deal for the young unemployed in Hendon. [75782]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Andrew Dismore, dated 11 March 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your question about the progress of the New Deal for young unemployed people in Hendon. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

I regret that separate figures are not generally available for individual towns, or for constituencies. Government Statistical Service figures are produced for Employment Service Unit of Delivery areas. Hendon falls within the Edgware and Leaside Unit of Delivery.

The latest Government Statistical Service figures to the end of December 1998, and including Management Information to the end of January 1999, show that 3,329 young people have started on New Deal for 18–24 year olds in the Edgware and Leaside Unit of Delivery. Of these, 509 have secured unsubsidised employment; 100 have started subsidised employment through the New Deal Employment option; and 564 have started on either the Full-Time Education and Training, or one of the work experience options. Of the remainder, the majority are still in the initial Gateway phase of the New Deal. There will be other young people who have left the New Deal for jobs, and stopped receiving the Jobseeker's Allowance, without telling the Employment Service their reasons for leaving.

I hope this is helpful.

Ofsted

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 8 February 1999, Official Report, column 107, if he will set out the budget for Ofsted for the financial years (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99, calculated on the same basis as the figures contained in his answer. [75488]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Total provision for Ofsted in the financial year 1998–99 is £110.3 million and total expenditure for 1997–98 was £151 million. The reduction in 1998–99 results principally from the change, announced by the previous Government and confirmed in July 1997 in the "Excellence in schools" White Paper, from a four-year cycle of school inspections to a differentiated approach in which schools will be inspected at least every six years but more frequently where weaknesses are apparent, and from lower than expected contract prices for inspections.

Child Minders

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will review local authority circular 94/23 which permits child minders to smack minded children with parental permission. [75152]

Ms Hodge: The guidance was introduced following a High Court judgment. The Department of Health will shortly be consulting on how the law can be improved to better protect children from assault. We will review the guidance in the light of this consultation.

A-levels (Review)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to announce the findings of his review of A-levels; and if he will make a statement. [75660]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 9 March 1999]: We expect to make an announcement shortly on taking forward our commitment to support broader A-levels and upgrade vocational qualifications, underpinned by rigorous standards and key skills. This will support A-level students studying more subjects particularly in the first year of sixth form, recognising the lower levels of taught time at this stage in England compared with other European countries. We have already made it clear that reforms will be introduced nationally for teaching from September 2000.

National Curriculum (Review)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he plans to announce the findings of his review of the national curriculum; and if he will make a statement. [75661]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 9 March 1999]: We will be consulting widely on draft proposals for revisions to the National Curriculum during the summer. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will then make final decisions in the early autumn before the revised National Curriculum is sent to schools. Schools will then have most of the 1999–2000 school year to prepare for any changes from September 2000.

Education Standards (Staffordshire)

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of education standards in (a) Tamworth Borough and (b) Staffordshire. [75651]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Statistics showing the standards of attainment by pupils in each school and local authority area are published in annual performance tables. A summary of recent results in Staffordshire and in primary and secondary schools in Tamworth Borough, which is not itself a local education authority, is set out in the following table. A sample of schools in each authority is inspected annually by Ofsted and reports published which include judgments about standards of attainment and the quality of education. A programme of inspections of all local education authorities is now being carried out by Ofsted, but none of the named authorities has yet been inspected. All authorities have just submitted for approval an Education Development Plan which includes a three-year programme for securing school improvement, and targets including those for pupil performance at ages 11 and 16 which will be monitored in future years.

Education SSAs

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will make a statement on the funding for education in Staffordshire in 1999–2000; [75652]

(2) what assessment he has made of the current SSA formula for the distribution of education funding to shire authorities; [75653]

(3) if he will review the current SSA formula for funding education; [75654]

(4) what meetings he has had with Ministers at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to discuss the review of the SSA formula for education. [75655]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 9 March 1999]: The education SSA for Staffordshire for 1999–2000 represents an underlying increase of £18.2 million or 6 per cent., after allowing for local authority changes of function. An increase on that scale should be sufficient to meet the pressures faced by Staffordshire schools, although my right hon. Friend appreciates the concern expressed by schools in Staffordshire and elsewhere about the fairness of the current education SSA system. In announcing the conclusions of the comprehensive Spending Review for the three years up to 2001–02, Ministers made it clear that they would not seek to change the current SSA system. It will, nevertheless, be subject to review. That will be led by DETR Ministers, and it will involve local government representation, and Ministers with local government service interests.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to take account of levels of turnover in pupil enrolments in setting local education authority standard spending assessments. [75751]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 9 March 1999]: None in the immediate future. In announcing the conclusions of the Comprehensive Spending Review for the three years up to 2001–02, Ministers made it clear that they would not seek to change the system of calculating standard spending assessments. It will, nevertheless, be subject to review. That will be led by DETR Ministers, and it will involve local government representation, and Ministers with local government service interests.

Employment Service

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of the Employment Service targets under the New Deal had been achieved by 1 March 1999. [75667]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Graham Brady, dated 11 March 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply direct to your question regarding what proportion of the Employment Service targets under the New Deal had been achieved by 1 March. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The most recent information available relates to the position at the end of January. This shows that the Employment Service had by then achieved 55% of its target to place 100,000 New Deal for 18–24 year old participants into work during 1998–99. The target set for the Employment Service measures only those young people who secure employment as a direct result of a submission to a vacancy by the Employment Service or one of its partners.

I hope this is helpful.

Single Gateway

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of those entering the New Deal Gateway in January 1998 were still in the Gateway on 31 December 1998. [75666]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Graham Brady, dated 11 March 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your question about the percentage of young people who joined the New Deal Gateway in January 1998 who were still in the Gateway on 31st December 1998. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Of those young people who entered the New Deal Gateway in January 1998, 3% were recorded as still being in the Gateway at the end of December 1998. In some cases this will be because they have had a number of periods of sickness, or have left the Gateway for other reasons, but on each occasion returned within 13 weeks of leaving.

I hope this is helpful.

Early Years Education

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice has been issued to local education authorities on involving (a) parents and (b) governors in the development of early years education. [75564]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 9 March 1999]: The planning guidance on Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships for 1999–2000 asks Partnerships to ensure that the interests of parents, including those parents in employment, and of maintained schools, including nursery schools, are properly represented in drawing up the Early Years Development and Childcare Plan.

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which local education authorities have submitted their draft Early Years Development Plans to his Department for approval; and how many have been approved. [75563]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 9 March 1999]: All local education authorities have submitted Early Years Development and Childcare Plans for approval. I shall shortly announce which have been approved.

Local Decision Making

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice has been issued to local education authorities on involving (a) parents and (b) governors in decision making on local education services, and giving them representation on (i) local education authority education committees and (ii) children's panels. [75565]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 9 March 1999]: We are keen to encourage parents and governors to become involved in decision making on education services. The Department has not issued general guidance to local education authorities on how to achieve this, although guidance to authorities on specific functions has included appropriate advice, for example the guidance on Education Development Plans issued in September 1998. The Department is due to consult on draft regulations on parent governor representatives on local authority committees dealing with education in the next few weeks, and to issue the final regulations and guidance in the summer. I believe that the reference to children's panels relates to Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships which are covered in a reply given today by the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), at column 320.

Innovative Projects Programme

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he plans to announce the outcome of bids for funding under the New Deal: Innovative Projects programme. [75748]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Robin Corbett, dated 11 March 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your question about when the outcome of bids for funding under the New Deal Innovation Fund will be announced. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

It may be helpful if I explain that New Deal Partnerships will have two opportunities a year to bid for funding from the Innovation Fund. Guidance will be issued to all partnerships in early April, alongside a timetable for bids to be received for assessment. We hope that the successful bids from the first round of assessments will be announced in July or August of this year.

I hope this is helpful.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75871]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 10 March 1999]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of select committees giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts of select committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor to the best of my knowledge there have been any occasions on which members of select committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in the Department. this excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

Rainsford School, Chelmsford

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 5 March 1999, Official Report, columns 951–52, concerning Rainsford School, when he expects (a) the further consultations to end with Essex Local Education Authority and local schools and (b) a decision to be taken on the case for admitting a pupil whose name has been sent to him. [76107]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have asked Essex Local Education Authority to provide details of this pupil and their handling of the direction process, along with information about alternative local schools, by Monday 15 March. Their response will determine whether we need to write to any other schools. Only once all local consultation is fully completed will it be possible for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to make a decision.

Higher Education Funding Council

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish the Quinquennial Review report on the Higher Education Funding Council for England. [76734]

Mr. Blunkett: I am publishing the report today. Copies have been placed in the Library.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Arts Funding

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much additional money would have been available to (a) the Arts Council, (b) the Sports Council, (c) the Millennium Commission and (d) the Heritage Lottery Fund in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99 if the Government had not introduced the New Opportunities Fund. [72175]

Mr. Chris Smith: In line with the overall income forecast of £10.6 billion, we expect the arts, sport, heritage and charities (with £1.85 billion each) and the Millennium Commission (£2.017 billion) to receive more in the current licence period than was originally forecast.

Any retrospective reallocation of the sums announced for the New Opportunities Fund (£1 billion) and the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts (£200 million) is entirely hypothetical.

Lobbyists

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the role of professional lobbyists in formulating policy in his Department. [74359]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 4 March 1999]: Any contacts with lobbyists by Ministers and civil servants in this Department are conducted in accordance with the "Ministerial Code and Guidance for Civil Servants: Contact with Lobbyists".

Departmental Logo

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what was the cost of (a) developing and (b) introducing the new departmental logo. [75184]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 5 March 1999]: (a) The budget for developing the departmental visual identity was £26,000. We are still awaiting final invoices, but expect the final outturn to be close to budget.

(b) Introducing the new visual identity incurred no further costs, and has already resulted in savings of over 25 per cent. on the procurement of the Department's printed stationery. This will be a continuing saving and further efficiency improvements are also expected.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on what criteria the new departmental logo was chosen. [75296]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The logo, and the new visual identity of which it is a part, had to serve the overall purposes of the exercise. These were to improve the consistency and distinctiveness of DCMS communications. Further criteria were cost-effectiveness and acceptability to DCMS staff.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport in what colours the new departmental logo will be available; and what the criteria are for deciding how the different colour logos are to be used by his Department. [75298]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The new visual identity uses a palette of 15 colours which will be used on the Department's publications and printed stationery. The Pantone Matching System references for these colours are:

5483
032
5125
279
104
382
451
124
239
626
2735
633
130.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the contract for the design for his new departmental logo was put out to tender. [75297]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Yes. (The contract, however, included much more than designing a new departmental logo.)

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many design options for his Department's new logo were put forward for consideration; and to whom. [75295]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The initial phase of the communications consultancy involved extensive discussions with DCMS staff and with a variety of "partner bodies". The design company then put forward three options for a new visual identity to Ministers and staff.

Tourism Strategy

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans the Government have to encourage the regeneration of traditional seaside resorts (a) through grant aid and (b) otherwise. [75699]

Janet Anderson: The Single Regeneration Budget brings together 20 separate programmes to create a flexible fund for local regeneration. In September, Ministers at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions announced that SRB funds—about £3.8 billion over the next three years—would be available to tackle pockets of deprivation, including coastal towns. 44 of the bids included proposals for the regeneration of seaside resorts.

"Tomorrow's Tourism", our tourism strategy document published on 26 February, addresses this important industry sector and, through the eight-stage regeneration plan for resorts, will help to create the right framework in which tourism can flourish. The future of our seaside resorts depends on all those involved in both private and public sectors working together to develop the sort of products now needed and with the quality and value for money which visitors expect. The Government will continue to explore ways to encourage the regeneration of traditional seaside resorts.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how the Government intend to implement their tourism strategy; and if he will make a statement. [75793]

Janet Anderson: Our strategy document, "Tomorrow's Tourism", sets out a number of specific proposals for action. The Government will review, and report annually on, the progress made in implementing the strategy.

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has for overseas promotions to encourage people to visit traditional British seaside resorts. [75698]

Janet Anderson: The Government sponsor the British Tourist Authority, who are responsible for the promotion overseas of Britain as a tourist destination. The BTA assists seaside resorts both by promoting them in its overseas campaigns—such as Waterfront Britain, British Arts Cities, the Millennium Touring Brochure, UK The Guide, Britain for Walkers and the Movie Map—and by encouraging resorts to participate in overseas marketing partnerships and in overseas consumer trade exhibitions.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what were the design, printing and distribution costs of the document, "Tomorrow's Tourism". [75185]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The costs of designing, printing and distributing 15,000 copies of the document "Tomorrow's Tourism" are as follows:

Design

We are awaiting the final invoice from the company responsible for design, typesetting, proof reading and the conversion of the text into a format suitable for the Internet. However, we expect the final cost to be approximately £35,000.

Print

The cost of printing 15,000 copies of the document was £25,510.00.

Distribution

The distribution was undertaken by DCMS employees. The overall cost of postage was £1,850.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions his Department held with each of the RDAs about the context of "Tomorrow's Tourism" prior to its publication. [75567]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Our strategy was developed with full involvement from the industry and other Government Departments with an interest in Tourism. This included the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, who have the policy lead for the RDAs. I discussed our new tourism strategy, "Tomorrow's Tourism" with the Chairmen designate of all the RDAs on 18 February.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if copies of "Tomorrow's Tourism" were sent to each of the chairmen designate of the RDAs. [75566]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Chairmen and Chief Executives designate of the RDAs were each sent copies of "Tomorrow's Tourism" on 25 February.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with (a) the English Tourist Board, (b) regional tourist boards and (c) representatives of tourist attractions about proposals for a national quality assurance scheme; and if he will make a statement. [76068]

Mr. Chris Smith: One of the key aims of our new tourism strategy, "Tomorrow's Tourism", published on 26 February, is to develop and spread quality. "Tomorrow's Tourism" was developed with full involvement from the industry, including the English Tourist Board and the Regional Tourist Boards. The strategy promotes the use of the new harmonised quality standards for accommodation being launched to consumers in September. The ETB is considering the use of quality assurance schemes for other industry sectors, including the attractions sector.

Lottery Film Programme

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money has been recouped to date by the Lottery Film Programme. [75750]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 9 March 1999]: To date, the Arts Council of England's Lottery Film Programme has recouped £2.33 million.

Lottery Funding

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much of its funding from the National Lottery the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts will make available for projects to turn innovations into products and services. [76027]

Mr. Chris Smith: The National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts is funded by an endowment of £200 million from the National Lottery, which will provide an annual income of up to £10 million. It has yet to be decided how the amounts will be apportioned to the different parts of NESTA's remit. As well as funding innovative products and services, finance will be provided for mentoring and placement schemes; masterclasses; centres of excellence; showcasing and summer schools.

Television Licence Fee

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when regulations will be laid to bring into effect the television licence fee increases due to come into force on 1 April. [76731]

Mr. Chris Smith: On 15 December 1998, Official Report, columns 420–21, I announced that, from 1 April 1999, the fee for a colour television licence would increase to £101 and that for a black and white licence to £33.50. I have today laid before Parliament the regulations necessary to bring these fees into force.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Serious Fraud

29. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Attorney-General what steps he is taking to ensure that sufficient resources are deployed to counter serious fraud. [74110]

The Solicitor-General: The Serious Fraud Office deals with the most serious and complex fraud. The Comprehensive Spending Review resulted in an increase in financial resources available to the SFO over the next three years. In return, the SFO will be expected to increase its caseload and reduce average case costs and the average time it takes to investigate without sacrificing quality. Staff and other resources are sufficient to handle the current caseload.

Serious Fraud Office

30. Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Attorney-General what proportion of cases investigated by the Serious Fraud Office in the past 12 months have resulted in a conviction. [74111]

The Solicitor-General: In the year to the end of February 1999, the Serious Fraud Office concluded 20 trials involving 38 defendants. In 19 of these trials, at least one defendant was convicted, usually the principal defendant. Of the 38 defendants, a total of 32 were convicted.

Private Prosecutions

31. Mr. Chope: To ask the Attorney-General how many applications he has received in the last year for him to halt private prosecutions. [74112]

The Attorney-General: The only power vested in me to halt proceedings is the right to enter a nolle prosequi, which is confined to cases proceeding on indictment in the Crown Court. It is usually more appropriate for requests to stop proceedings to be considered by the Crown Prosecution Service, which does have the power to intervene in all criminal cases.

Comprehensive statistics relating to applications for nolle prosequi are not kept and in any event would not separately identify those relating to private prosecutions.

Cross-border Crime

32. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General what discussions he has had with colleagues in other jurisdictions on cross-border crime. [74113]

The Attorney-General: I maintain a close dialogue with colleagues on all matters of mutual interest, including how to prosecute effectively those involved in cross-border crime.

Crown Prosecution Service

34. Mr. Lock: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the appointment of area business managers of the Crown Prosecution Service as part of the reorganisation of the CPS. [74115]

The Attorney-General: An exercise to select 42 Area Business Managers was advertised to staff within the Crown Prosecution Service. This has been completed and 37 Area Business Managers were appointed on 1 February 1999.

It is anticipated that the five remaining posts will be the subject of appointments in April. This step, together with the appointment of 42 Chief Crown Prosecutors, represents the most significant single step towards the restructuring of the CPS into 42 Areas as we promised on taking office.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Attorney-General what steps he is taking to improve the effectiveness of the Crown Prosecution Service. [74114]

The Attorney-General: Sir Iain Glidewell's Report on the Crown Prosecution Service made a number of recommendations aimed at improving the effectiveness of the Crown Prosecution Service.

Under its new Director of Public Prosecutions and Chief Executive, the Crown Prosecution Service is making good progress in considering and implementing the Glidewell recommendations. From April 1999, the Crown Prosecution Service will be reorganised into 42 geographical Areas; the appointment of 42 new Chief Crown Prosecutors for England and Wales was announced by the Director of Public Prosecutions this week.

35. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the progress of appointments of the new Chief Crown Prosecutors. [74116]

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions announced on Monday 8 March the appointment of 42 Chief Crown Prosecutors for the new Crown Prosecution Service Areas and three Assistant Chief Crown Prosecutors for London.

This complements the appointment of 42 Area Business Managers referred to in my answer to the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock) at column 327. The restructuring of CPS into 42 areas not only fulfils our promise on taking office, but is an important milestone in restructuring the criminal justice system on a more rational basis—which will facilitate closer liaison between police and the CPS as well as greater co-operation among the criminal justice agencies as a whole.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police Manpower

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were (a) in each division of the Metropolitan police force and (b) in total, (i) on the last date for which figures are available, (ii) on 31 March 1998, (iii) 31 March 1997 and (iv) 31 March 1992. [75271]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police tells me that the information is not available for the precise dates requested, but that it is recorded for different dates, as in the table. The various reasons why some entries are blank are that:

(i) West Hendon and Golders Green Divisions amalgamated to form Collingdale in August 1997; and

(ii) there were some different divisional boundaries, and a different area structure, within the Metropolitan Police District in 1992. The Area Headquarters in 1992 were not the same Headquarters as those in later years and the final 21 entries in the table, starting with WD, relate to divisions and areas that existed only in 1992.

Integrated Immigration Caseworking System

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department carried out a feasibility study before it agreed the contract for an integrated immigration caseworking system; and if he will make a statement. [75741]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The need for an integrated Information Technology system in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) was originally identified in an independent study carried out by Sema Group in 1994, which recommended a programme of computerisation to achieve productivity improvements. During the competition for the contract IND received confirmation of this assessment from each of the three shortlisted service providers, working on-site with full access to officials at all levels. Siemens Business Services proposed the extensive use of electronic imaging of documents. The technical feasibility of achieving this was established by visits to reference sites where such systems were already in use.

Coldingley Prison

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 4 February 1999, Official Report, column 752, on HMP Coldingley, (1) if Wackenhut (UK) Limited paid the sums owing in relation to the contract at HMP Coldingley within the 30-day payment period; and if he will make a statement; [75731]

(2) what other sums have been established by the Prison Service as due from Wackenhut (UK) Limited; and if he will make a statement; [75732]

(3) what is the total amount which Wakenhut (UK) Limited has owed the Home Office in relation to the contract at HMP Coldingley; what sums are outstanding currently; and if he will make a statement. [75733]

Mr. George Howarth: Wackenhut UK Limited has paid all of the £170,531 which was owed at 29 January, together with invoices for £50,507 issued by the Prison Service since that date, and the Prison Service had paid Wackenhut £76,522 in respect of goods provided by Wackenhut.

Work is continuing to ascertain other sums due from Wackenhut, and the Prison Service is considering claims made by the company.

The payment of all moneys identified as being owed by Wackenhut to the Prison Service will be rigorously pursued.

Women Prisoners

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the provision of places at open prisons for women. [75713]

Mr. George Howarth: The table lists the three female open establishments. These prisons currently provide 519 certified normal accommodation (CNA) places for 481 sentenced adults and young offenders. There are no current plans to change the number of places provided.

CNA places and population at open female establishments as of 8 March 1999

HMP Askham Grange	130	128
HMP and YOI Drake Hall	295	266
HMP and YOI East Sutton Park	94	87
Total	519	481

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average annual increase in the number of (a) women prisoners and (b) places at open prisons for women in each of the last five years and in total. [75780]

Mr. George Howarth: Information on the average female prison population is given in table 1. This information, up to 1997, is published in "Prison statistics England and Wales" (Table 1.2 of the 1997 edition), a copy of which is in the library. Information on the certified normal accommodation (CNA) for female open prisons is given in table 2.

Life Prisoners

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners serving life sentences have escaped from open prisons in each of the last 10 years; and how many were convicted for an offence committed while escaping. [75551]

Mr. George Howarth: Central records cover the period from 1 March 1991. The number of reported absconds by life sentence prisoners from within open prisons since that date is as follows:

Date	Number
1 March 1991–29 February 1992	7
1 March 1992–28 February 1993	12
1 March 1993–28 February 1994	13
1 March 1994–28 February 1995	10
1 March 1995–29 February 1996	18
1 March 1996–29 February 1997	9
1 March 1997–28 February 1998	9
1 March 1998–28 February 1999	12

As there is no central record of either those absconds which occurred prior to 1 March 1991, or offences committed by prisoners whilst at large, the further details requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners serving life sentences are currently placed at open prisons. [75552]

Mr. George Howarth: On 31 January 1999, there were 380 life sentence prisoners in open prisons in England and Wales.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy concerning the placement of life sentence prisoners in open prisons. [75558]

Mr. George Howarth: A period in open conditions is regarded as essential for most life sentence prisoners before they are considered for release on life licence. This period allows for the testing of areas of concern in conditions which are closer to those in the community than are found in closed prisons. Decisions to transfer life sentence prisoners to open conditions are taken by Ministers on consideration of recommendations made by the Parole Board.

The Secretary of State's directions to the Parole Board in relation to mandatory life sentence prisoners require the Board, before making a recommendation for transfer to open conditions, to balance the risks against the benefits of such a move, taking into account:

a. whether the lifer has made sufficient progress towards tackling offending behaviour to minimise the risk and gravity of re-offending and whether the benefits suggest that a transfer to open conditions is worthwhile at that stage; and

b. whether the lifer is trustworthy enough not to abscond or to commit further offences (either inside or outside the prison).

In each case the Board is also directed to consider whether:

a. the extent to which the risk that the lifer will abscond or commit further offences while in an open prison is minimal;

b. the lifer has shown by his performance in closed conditions that he has made positive efforts to address his attitudes and behavioural problems and the extent to which significant progress has been made in doing so; and

c. the lifer is likely to derive benefit from being able to continue to address areas of concern in an open prison and to be tested in a more realistic environment.

The same considerations apply in principle to recommendations for the transfer to open conditions of those subject to discretionary and other life sentences.

Workplace Drug Screening

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he will take to ensure that workplace drug screening programmes are applied equally to employees at all levels within the organisation. [75647]

Mr. Straw: The Home Office does not operate any drug screening programmes of its employees within the workplace.

Firearms Compensation

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the criteria for determining compensation claims under Option C for people required to hand in firearms and ancillary equipment; and how the criteria were established. [75619]

Mr. Boateng: Claims under all options of the firearms compensation schemes are determined by the eligibility requirements set out in the Firearms (Amendment) Acts 1997 and in the compensation schemes. To qualify for compensation, a surrendered handgun or small calibre pistol must be a prohibited weapon as defined in the Acts, and ancillary equipment must be of a type specified in the compensation schemes. The categories of ancillary equipment covered by the schemes were drawn up in consultation with a number of shooting representative bodies.

Derker and Stoneleigh Residents Association

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Derker and Stoneleigh Residents Association in Oldham. [75517]

Mr. Boateng: The Derker and Stoneleigh Residents Association wrote to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 17 February 1999 and will receive a reply very shortly. I am not aware of any other representations.

Refugee Arrivals Project

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many refugees have been allocated to the North East Region by the Refugee Arrivals Project; where they have settled; and what is the unit cost per week in each location. [76127]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Refugee Arrivals Project provides an advice service to asylum seekers arriving at Gatwick or Heathrow who declare their application for asylum at their port of entry. Such asylum seekers may be entitled to income support and housing benefit. Because of current difficulties experienced by single asylum seekers in obtaining suitable accommodation in the London area, the Refugee Arrivals Project has advised some to seek support in other parts of the country. At present, about 350 asylum seekers have gone to the North East Region while their asylum claim is being considered.

Chelmsford Prison

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action will be taken following the report by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Prisons on HM Prison Chelmsford to rectify problems identified in that report; and if he will make a statement. [76080]

Mr. George Howarth: Work has already begun to address the issues raised in the report including installation of a new cell call bell system and the building of a new reception area.

The Prison Service will, within 30 working days of the date of publication of the report, prepare an action plan addressing all the recommendations made by the Chief Inspector.

Sexual Offences

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals have been wrongly (a) arrested and (b) convicted for committing sexual offences from 1995 to date; and if he will make a statement. [74073]

Mr. Boateng: Data on wrongful arrest are not collected centrally. Data on wrongful conviction are available for persons whose appeals against conviction were heard at the Crown Court or the Court of Appeal and are as follows:

Appeals from persons against conviction (1) for a sexual offence where the conviction was quashed (2), 1995–1997.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many appeals are currently being considered from individuals who assert that they are innocent of sexually related offences. [74074]

Mr. Boateng: At 1 March of this year, in the Court of Appeal, there were 264 outstanding applications from individuals against conviction for a sexually related offence.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the sexual offences currently being investigated relate to incidents which took place more than a year ago. [74075]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is not recorded centrally.

Sexual Abuse (Compensation)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average level of compensation paid to a victim of sexual abuse in the three most recent available years. [74076]

Mr. Boateng: Data are only available for claims received on or after 1 April 1996 under the tariff-based criminal injuries compensation scheme effective from that date. Details of awards made in respect of sexual abuse in childhood are as follows:

Period	Average award
1 April 1996 to 31 March 1997	4,388
1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998	4,609

Pascal Lissouba

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the terms are under which Pascal Lissouba has been given rights of residence in the United Kingdom. [76140]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is not our practice to disclose details of individuals' immigration records.

Railway Stations (CCTV)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultation has taken place between (i) his Department and Railtrack and (ii) the British Transport Police and Railtrack on the co-ordination of publicly funded CCTV and CCTV operated by Railtrack; in how many mainline railway stations there is currently (a) operational CCTV, (b) installed but non-operational CCTV and (c) no CCTV; and if he will make a statement. [75700]

Dr. Reid: I have been asked to reply.

No specific discussions have been held between my Department and Railtrack concerning CCTV. The British Transport Police (BTP) hold discussions with Railtrack on an ad hoc basis regarding the installation of CCTV. Initiatives such as the Secure Stations Scheme and the Secure Car Parks Scheme require Railtrack, the BTP and the train operators to liaise on improving security at stations with measures such as CCTV.

Eleven of the 14 mainline stations operated by Railtrack have some form of operational CCTV. At the remaining three, CCTV has been installed but it is not operational. No information is held centrally on the number of CCTV cameras and their operational status for the rest of the network.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Prime Minister what the cost has been of his visits to Scotland in the current year, and if he will provide a break down of (a) travel, (b) accommodation, (c) security and (d) other costs; how many civil servants travelled with him for each visit and what the cost was for each; and if he will list the meetings he held on each visit, stating at which ones he performed in his capacity as Prime Minister. [72616]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 February 1999]: I have visited Scotland on two occasions since 1 January 1999: Glasgow on 5 February and Glasgow again on 4–5 March 1999.

My programme on 5 February included a visit to the Royal Scottish Academy of Music and Drama and to the Western General Hospital. These engagements were undertaken in my capacity as Prime Minister. Separately, the Labour Party arranged a Question and Answer session in the Royal Scottish Academy of Music and Drama to which students were invited.

During my visit on 4–5 March I undertook a number of official engagements in my capacity as Prime Minister. These included a visit to Marconi Marine Limited and Richmond Park School, Glasgow and a Question and Answer session in Carluke. I also addressed the Scottish Labour Party Conference as Leader of the Labour Party.

On both occasions I was accompanied by five members of my Office and the usual number of security and secure telecommunications staff who travel with a Prime Minister on visits within the United Kingdom. This is in line with the practice adopted by previous Governments.

It is not possible to give costs for these visits as final bills are not yet in.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Prime Minister on what dates he plans to visit Scotland during the period of the Scottish general election campaign; from what source such trips will be financed; what role civil servants and special advisers will play on such visits; and if he will make a statement. [72617]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 February 1999]: My programme of visits during the campaign is yet to be finalised although I greatly look forward to visiting Scotland over the next few months. Depending on the nature of the visit, travel costs for any visits will be met from the appropriate source. All expenditure will be in accordance with the Ministerial Code.

Involvement by civil servants, including Special Advisers will take place in line with the relevant guidance set out in the Civil Service Code, the Ministerial Code and the Model Contract for Special Advisers.

I also refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) on 16 February 1999, Official Report, column 721, setting out guidance to civil servants during the period before the forthcoming elections to the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister (1) which countries of the G8 he has visited since 1 May 1997; [76155]

(2) when he plans to make an official visit to Canada. [76137]

The Prime Minister: I have visited all the G8 countries, with the exception of Canada. I look forward to visiting Canada at the earliest possible date, thus reciprocating Prime Minister Chretien's successful visit to Britain in May last year.

Food Safety

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Prime Minister how many representations he has received during the last six months on food safety; and how many of these mentioned (a) genetically-modified organisms, (b) genetic engineering and (c) biotechnology. [75064]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 March 1999]: My office has received 100,000 items of correspondence from members of the public in the last six months. Approximately 2,400 have related to food safety and biotechnology issues and, of these, approximately 100 have specifically mentioned genetically modified organisms or genetic engineering.

Gibraltar

Mr. Howard: To ask the Prime Minister if he has responded to the allegations by the Prime Minister of Spain regarding criminal activity in Gibraltar. [75795]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 9 March 1999]: We are investigating these allegations, together with the relevant Gibraltar authorities. This involves careful and detailed research but we expect to respond shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Genetically Modified Crops

14. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received advocating a moratorium on the planting of genetically modified crops. [74093]

Mr. Rooker: We have received representations from a range of organisations and individuals advocating a moratorium on commercial planting of genetically modified crops.

24. Mr. Syms: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about English Nature's recommendation on the planting of genetically modified crops. [74105]

Mr. Rooker: The Government believe that the necessary protection of the environment can be achieved without the moratorium on herbicide-tolerant and insect-resistant crops which English Nature have recommended.

Food Safety Regulations

15. Mr. Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about food safety regulations in other parts of the EU. [74094]

Mr. Rooker: Food safety is an area of EU competence. Most food law is harmonised across the EU and rules equivalent to those in place in the UK apply in other Member States. The Government see this as the best way to promote common food safety standards across the EU.

Fur Farming

17. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has made to his European colleagues to bring about an EU-wide ban on fur farming. [74096]

Mr. Morley: The Government's primary concern is to bring about an end to fur farming in this country, which is why we are supporting the Private Member's Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle). We have made it clear in Council of Europe discussions on welfare standards that the UK is opposed for ethical reasons to fur farming.

Food Marketing

18. Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures his Department is taking to improve marketing in the food industry. [74098]

Mr. Rooker: We pursue a range of activities to help the agri-food industry to improve its marketing performance. We also work with industry initiatives in this area.

Flood Defences

20. Mr. Amess: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received about the impact of the operation of flood defences on fisheries. [74101]

Mr. Morley: Fishermen have an opportunity to make representations to the responsible authority when proposals for flood defence work are advertised under the Environmental Impact Assessment Regulations. MAFF is not aware of any recent cases where the authorities have been unable to resolve any potential problems raised.

Animal Feed

21. Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action his Department plans to take to ensure animal feed including genetically modified ingredients is adequately labelled. [74102]

Mr. Rooker: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him on 15 February 1999, Official Report, column 576.

British Fishing Industry

22. Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has for ensuring that charges made by public bodies and regulated bodies to the British fishing industry are no higher than the charges imposed on the fishing industries in the rest of Europe. [74103]

Mr. Morley: Charges by public or regulated bodies to the British fishing industry can be made only within the statutory frameworks of the bodies concerned, which will include procedures for complaints or representations against levels set. It would not be appropriate for my Department to seek to vary these by reference to the actions of similar bodies elsewhere in Europe.

Food Labelling

23. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further steps he is intending to take to ensure better labelling of the products of humanely reared animals. [74104]

Mr. Morley: We will continue to encourage the growing number of organisations who have responded to consumer demand by introducing schemes which allow easy identification of food produced from animals reared to high welfare standards.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to improve the accuracy and informative content of food labelling. [74088]

Mr. Rooker: Detailed and extensive rules on food labelling are already in place, including a general prohibition on falsely describing food or labelling it in a way likely to mislead. In addition new regulations on the labelling of genetically modified soya and maize will be laid shortly and, from February next year, further information covering the quantity of certain ingredients in certain foods will be required.

Common Fisheries Policy

25. Mr. Brady: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the practice of quota hopping in relation to the common fisheries policy. [74106]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 467, and the reply given to my hon. Friend for Castle Point (Mrs. Butler) on 2 March 1999, Official Report, column 718.

Organic Farmers

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the help he is proposing to give to those farmers who wish to change to organic production. [74095]

Mr. Morley: We will be seeking Parliamentary approval shortly to double the rate of aid for farmers in England converting to organic practices, following approval of the revised scheme from the European Commission. We have also increased support for the Organic Conversion Information Service, which advises farmers about conversion.

Organic Production

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what support his Department is giving to research into organic production techniques. [74099]

Mr. Morley: MAFF has a dedicated programme of research into organic farming methods. The value of this programme will rise to £2.1 million (an increase of 40 per cent.) in 1999–2000.

Biodiversity

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact on biodiversity of the adoption of intensive farming methods since 1969. [74951]

Mr. Morley: The Ministry is a partner in the UK Biodiversity Action Plan, which concluded that the adoption of intensive farming methods has had a substantial adverse impact on biodiversity. The Ministry is currently funding research into the effects of intensive management of arable land on birds, and of intensive management of grassland on birds and invertebrates. In addition the Ministry is continuing to fund work on the indirect effects of pesticides on birds.

Intervention Board

Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how the Intervention Board performed against its targets for 1997–98. [76732]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Intervention Board's performance against its key targets in 1997–98 was as follows:

Percentage

	Target	1997–98 Performance
Percentage of claims processed within deadlines	99.0	91.3
Percentage of claims processed correctly	98.5	99.5
Cumulative running cost efficiency gains	2.5	0.4
Improvement in index of productivity	6.0	–3.7
Ratio of disallowance to EAGER funds handled	0.40	0.06
To maintain expenditure within vote provision, cash and running cost limits	—	Met
New value for money savings in procurement of goods and services	6.5	11.0
Yield: cost ratio of anti-fraud activities	3.0:1.0	5.8:1.0

Cattle Passports

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cattle now have passports issued by the British Cattle Movement Service. [76733]

Mr. Rooker: The British Cattle Movement Service (BCMS) has now provided more than a million cattle with passports since its launch on 28 September 1998. In addition BCMS has processed more than a million passports of slaughtered cattle, entered more than 600,000 live cattle movements on to the Cattle Tracing System database, and dealt with around 140,000 phone calls from farmers to its Helpline.

These are impressive achievements. As a result of BCMS' work, it will be much easier to check where cattle have been during their lives. This will help to trace animals during disease outbreaks, and is an important factor in rebuilding confidence in British cattle and beef, at home and abroad.

CAP Reform

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made on reform of the Common Agricultural Policy, with particular reference to wheat production. [74080]

Mr. Morley: The Government strongly support the European Commission's proposal for a 20 per cent. cut in the intervention price for cereals. If this is agreed by the Council of Ministers, European wheat prices would come into line with world prices, to the benefit of consumers.

Supermarket Chains

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from (a) farmers and (b) consumer groups on the buying power of supermarket chains; and if he will make a statement. [74092]

Mr. Rooker: We have received a number of representations from both farmers and consumer groups on the buying power and pricing policies of supermarkets. These are matters within the competence of the competition authorities and are currently subject to an inquiry by the Office of Fair Trading which expects to report on their findings later this month.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the (a) number and (b) value of national insurance payments in arrears; and if he will make a statement. [74034]

Mr. Timms: The collection of National Insurance contributions is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Contributions Agency, George Bertram. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from George Bertram to Mr. David Atkinson, dated 10 March 1999:

As Chief Executive of the Contributions Agency, I have responsibility for answering questions about the Contributions Agency and operational matters relating to the collection of National Insurance contributions (NICs). I have been asked to reply to your question about the number of National Insurance (NI) debtors and the amount of NI in arrears.

Although the Agency has the ability to collect information on the debt outstanding from some of our customer groups, problems with the implementation of the Agency's NIRS2 computer system mean that these figures are not readily available.

Currently the Agency is concentrating its efforts on the NIRS2 Stabilisation and Recovery plan. However, when NIRS2 is fully implemented it will allow the Agency to provide improved debt management and accountability.

The latest reliable information about NIC debt was reproduced in the National Audit Office report on the National Insurance Fund 1997–98 and used the information available within the Agency at 31 March 1998.

At the time the only figures available related to self-employed contributors who pay Class 2 NICs monthly by direct debit, or in quarterly instalments. The figure quoted in the NAO report was an estimate based on the outstanding debt recorded on the Agency's three main systems for recording Class 2 debt and amounted to £513 million, which represents a significant proportion of the Agency's total debt.

Overseas Pensioners

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost or uprating the pensions for UK citizens resident overseas in 1999–2000 in line with UK pensioners, for (a) all overseas pensioners and (b) only those overseas pensioners whose net income would increase as a result. [75238]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

The approximate cost of uprating pensions for all UK residents overseas in 1999–2000 in line with UK pensioners

	£ million
Not frozen cases	19
Frozen cases	18
Total	37

Notes:
1. The figures are based on recent data and allow for some increase in the numbers of overseas cases.
2. The numbers are presented in terms of the total cost of paying an annual uprating to all UK pensioners living overseas, including both cases that already receive annual uprating and those who do not (ie, the frozen cases).

Figures are provided by the Government Actuary's Department. The measure used to uprate pensions is the Retail Prices Index (RPI).

Pensioners (Income Support)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (i) single and (ii) married pensioners aged (a) 80 or above and (b) 75 to 79 are receiving weekly amounts of income support of (I) £0.01 to £2.99, (II) £3.00 to £4.99, (III) £5.00 to £9.99 and (IV) £10.00 to £14.99. [75538]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

Housing Benefit

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many households in receipt of housing benefit have no one in work in (i) Bolton, (ii) the North West and (iii) England. [75634]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

Council Tax Benefit

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what savings have been made so far by the Government as a consequence of the changes to council tax benefit regulations introduced on 1 April 1998; [75615]

(2) what estimate his Department has made of the savings in financial year 1999–2000 resulting from the changes to council tax benefit regulations introduced on 1 April 1998; [75696]

(3) when he will make a statement on the planned review of the changes to council tax benefit regulations introduced on 1 April 1998. [75695]

Angela Eagle: The information on savings made so far as a result of the April 1998 changes to the Council Tax Benefit regulations is not currently available. Savings for the financial year 1999–2000 are estimated to be £4 million (to the nearest million).

We are committed to monitoring the effects of the changes to the Council Tax Benefit Regulations introduced on 1 April 1998, in partnership with local authorities. Officials have recently conducted a competitive tender for research to monitor the change. The results will be published in due course.

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if people over retirement age will be exempt from inspection under the replacement for the Benefit Integrity Project. [75646]

Mr. Bayley: The new system of periodic inquiry into the current entitlement of people receiving Disability Living Allowance (DLA) will be introduced from April 1999. Of claimants aged 65 or over, those with lower awards of DLA may be contacted from the outset of the new process. Those with an award of DLA which comprises the higher rate of the mobility component with either the highest or middle rate of the care component will not be contacted in the early stages, as evidence indicates a low level of change in the entitlement of this group over time. We intend to evaluate and refine the process as it develops, and will be taking decisions about the position of this group in the light of growing experience.

State Earnings-related Pension

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the decision was taken to reduce the support available through SERPS to surviving spouses; and how this decision was published. [75683]

Angela Eagle: The Social Security Act 1986 reduced the amount of SERPS which a surviving spouse, who is widowed on or after 6 April 2000, can inherit from 100 per cent. to 50 per cent.

The intention to make this change was first publicised in the White Paper "Reform of Social Security—Programme for Action" (Cm 9691) in December 1985. The House debated the change during the passage of the Social Security Bill.

Details of the change have been published in DSS leaflets NP46 "A guide to Retirement Pensions" and NP45 "A guide to Widow's Benefits" since April 1996.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations have been received by him on the decision to reduce the level of support through SERPS available to surviving spouses. [75684]

Angela Eagle: We recognise that there is concern regarding the level of public awareness about the reduction, from 100 per cent. to 50 per cent., in the amount of SERPS which a surviving spouse can inherit on or after 6 April 2000. We are actively looking at ways of raising public awareness of this change.

Benefits (Sanctions)

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to introduce benefit sanctions for those claimants who break their probation or community service orders. [76084]

Angela Eagle: We are currently looking into the possibility of testing arrangements which would link benefit entitlement to compliance with community sentences so, for example, someone subject to a probation or community service order may lose benefit if they breach the conditions of the order.

Benefit Claims

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for each social security benefit (a) how many pieces of information must be provided in order to make an initial claim for benefit, (b) how many separate pieces of documentation must be provided in order to make an initial claim and (c) how many person-hours are on average required to process a single initial claim. [75945]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables.

Section 19 of the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997 makes benefit entitlement conditional upon a benefit claimant providing sufficient information for a NI No. for themselves and anyone else included in the claim to be traced and confirmed as appropriate to them.

It provides powers to disallow a claim if identity cannot be established or confirmed. The Benefits Agency (BA) has introduced new procedures for checking identities thoroughly using the powers in the fraud Act; this commenced on a rolling programme from 1 December 1997.

All claims to benefit must either be made in writing on a properly completed claim form relevant to the individual benefit being claimed, or in such other written manner that the Secretary of State will accept. The length and complexity, and therefore the amount of information required, varies from benefit to benefit and depends on an individual's personal circumstances. It is not possible to quantify exactly how many pieces of information must be provided.

The volume of documentation is similarly dependent on the individual benefit. For those customers on Income Support or Jobseeker's Allowance who are subject to the Evidence Requirement (ER) the claim form makes it clear which documents are required for a customer to satisfy that requirement. These include details of current and previous wages, any capital held, ground rent and service charges payable, details of any self-employment and any occupational pensions or other income which is received.

For those customers not subject to the ER it is for the Adjudication Officer to decide the amount of documentation required in order that when deciding upon the claim they can make a sound and reasoned decision thus protecting public funds.

Information on the time taken to clear a claim is in the tables.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are estimated to be ineligible for benefits under the minimum income guarantee, despite having incomes that fall below its threshold, who are aged (a) 60 to 74, (b) 75 to 79 and (c) over 80 years (i) in total and (ii) by gender. [75895]

Mr. Timms: The information is not currently available. We have previously estimated that the total number of pensioners who will be ineligible for the Minimum Income Guarantee because their savings exceed £8,000 but whose income is below the threshold is 230,000 (if income from savings is included in the assessment of total income) or 600,000 (if income from savings is not included).

These estimates were based on the data used to produce the published estimates of take-up of income related benefits. These estimates are currently being revised following the discovery in December of an error, the effect of which was to understate income brought to account. The estimates will be republished in May.

National Insurance Numbers

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures are in place to vet key staff involved in issuing national insurance numbers. [76085]

Mr. Timms: We are currently conducting a risk assessment and cost benefit analysis to identify the need for, and potential use of enhanced personnel checks.

We have recently reviewed our recruitment procedures for all staff. Our procedures already follow Cabinet Office guidelines. We are implementing a number of improvements which include; more rigorous checks on identity; new mandatory management checks of our recruitment procedures; internal audit checks to provide a further level of assurance.

Pensions

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the general levies payable under the Pension Schemes Act 1993 by occupational and personal pension schemes. [76730]

Mr. Timms: The general levy covers the costs of bodies which exist either to safeguard the rights of, or to provide information to, pension scheme members. These bodies are the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority (OPRA), the Pensions Advisory Service, the Pensions Registry and the Pensions Ombudsman. Rates of general levy for the 1999–2000 year are shown in the table.

The increase in the levy rates in respect of occupational pension schemes reflects, in particular, the steady increase in the number of cases OPRA is having referred to it and the complexity of the issues it is dealing with. It is important, therefore, that the Authority and the other bodies concerned continue to have the resources necessary to ensure that scheme members' interests are properly protected. The rates in respect of personal pension schemes remain the same as last year.

DEFENCE

Military Exercises

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) which countries had armed forces involved in the NATO joint exercise in Norway carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72828]

(2) what assessment he has made of the NATO joint exercise in Portugal carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72831]

(3) which countries had armed forces involved in the NATO joint exercise in Portugal carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72835]

(4) what is his assessment of the value of the NATO joint exercise in Norway carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998; [72968]

(5) what is his assessment of the principal benefits of the NATO joint exercise in Portugal carried out between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [72969]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 1 March 1999]: Exercise STRONG RESOLVE, which took place in March 1998 jointly in Norway and in Portugal, consisted of two halves; exercise CRISIS NORTH, in Norway, and exercise CRISIS SOUTH, in Portugal. The aim of exercise STRONG RESOLVE was to exercise NATO's ability to cope with multiple, simultaneous crises in separate geographic regions, drawing on the resources of both Major NATO Commanders, and involving the full spectrum of NATO missions, and the exercise is assessed to have succeeded in its aim. Members of the armed forces of the following nations participated in CRISIS NORTH: Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, the United Kingdom and the United States. Members of the armed forces of the following nations participated in CRISIS SOUTH: Belgium, the Czech Republic, the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Sweden, Spain, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States.

NATO

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will specify the minimum military readiness and training standards required of members of NATO; and whether the UK currently complies. [75274]

Mr. Doug Henderson: NATO Allies, including the United Kingdom, hold forces at a range of readiness and training levels required to meet the full range of Alliance missions, so that NATO is ready to respond effectively to present and future needs. The UK reports to NATO on its forces through the Alliance defence planning process.

Britannia Beagles Kennels

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost to public funds of (a) the demolition of the Britannia Beagles kennels at the Royal Naval College, Dartmouth and (b) their rebuilding elsewhere. [75525]

Mr. Spellar: The beagles at BRNC Dartmouth are funded by private subscriptions, and are not supported by public funds. The beagles are a registered encroachment, and as such the MOD can terminate the agreement at any time giving reasonable notice. The MOD is not liable for any damage or repairs and if notice was given for the beagle pack to leave BRNC Dartmouth, then any costs for a new facility outside the College would be the sole responsibility of the beagle pack.

As an option within the College redevelopment plan, the present beagle kennels have been identified as a potential site for the College's new recreational facility. However, options are still being developed and no decisions have yet been taken. The approximate cost of any demolition of the kennels would be in the region of £1,000.

Royal Hospital, Haslar

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions were given to (a) service personnel and (b) civilian personnel employed at the Royal Hospital, Haslar concerning (i) participation in the save Haslar rally and march on Sunday 24 January and (ii) signature of a petition to save Haslar organised by Gosport Borough Council. [75213]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Written instructions were issued to Service and civilian staff by the Hospital Commander at the Royal Hospital, Haslar concerning participation, by staff, in the 'Save Haslar' campaign. Those instructions reminded staff of their responsibilities as public servants. They also requested that items promoting the campaign should not be displayed within the hospital, directed that petition signatures should not be collected on site and advised Service personnel that they should not participate in the march, in accordance with joint Queen's Regulations and MOD policy.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the possible genetic effects on the children of veterans who served on Christmas Island during nuclear testing periods. [75831]

Mr. Spellar: My Department has not commissioned any research into the possible genetic effects on the children of nuclear test veterans who served on Christmas Island.

As far as I am aware, there is no scientific or medical evidence to show that health or other physical problems suffered by the children or grandchildren of nuclear test veterans can be attributed to participation in the UK's nuclear test programme 40 years ago.

In November 1997, the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) published the results of a major epidemiological study of the children of radiation workers. The study, entitled "Cancer in the Offspring of Radiation Workers—A Record Linkage Study" discounted the hypothesis (known as the Gardner Hypothesis) that fathers' exposure to radiation before conception is a cause of childhood leukaemia and non-Hodgkin lymphoma. This study was peer reviewed and published in the British Medical Journal.

The other major study in this area involved about 30,000 children of those Japanese nationals irradiated as a result of the dropping of atomic bombs on Japan in World War II. This was published in 1990 and failed to detect any significant excess of mutations, untoward pregnancy outcomes, childhood mortality or excess cancer.

A report on the US Nuclear tests published by the US Institute of Medicine in 1995 concluded that the size of the US test veteran population was not large enough to make practical a scientifically adequate and epidemiologically valid study of genetic effects in the children of test veterans. This is despite there being over 210,000 US test veterans, ten times the number in the UK.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reinstate multiple myeloma as a pensionable condition for UK nuclear test veterans. [74729]

Mr. Bayley: I have been asked to reply.

There is no prescribed list of medical conditions for which a war pension may be awarded. A war pension claimed more than seven years after discharge from service can be awarded for any condition, if, on the basis of reliable evidence, there is a reasonable doubt that disablement or death is due to service in HM forces. The Department's policy is that on current medical evidence and research a reasonable doubt has not been established that a causal link exists between multiple myeloma and participation in the UK nuclear tests programme. However, the Ministry of Defence has recently announced a further limited study into the incidence of multiple myeloma among veterans of the UKs atmospheric nuclear test programme in the 1950s. The results of this study are expected to be available by the end of next year.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the pension applications of nuclear test veterans that were rejected on the basis of the National Radiological Protection Board's conclusions on risk of cancer. [74727]

Mr. Bayley: I have been asked to reply.

We know of no reason to do so. We accept the current findings of the study by the National Radiological Protection Board. However, the Ministry of Defence has recently announced a further limited study into the incidence of multiple myeloma among veterans of the UKs atmospheric nuclear test programme in the 1950s. The results of this study are expected to be available by the end of next year.

CABINET OFFICE

Biotechnical Industry

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many unminuted pre-arranged meetings occurred between (a) himself, (b) Ministers in his Department and (c) his officials and representatives of the biotechnical industry sector since 1 May 1997. [74835]

Dr. Jack Cunningham [holding answer 5 March 1999]: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 25 February 1999, Official Report, column 430.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the biotechnical companies which have placed staff (a) on secondment and (b) on placement within his Department since 1 May 1997. [74841]

Dr. Jack Cunningham [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Secondments and attachments from other sectors of the economy are part of the Interchange Initiative, which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations.

No staff from biotechnology companies have been placed in the Cabinet Office since 1 May 1997.

Genetic Modification

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to his answer of 25 February 1999, Official

Report, column 430, on genetic modification, what criteria inform his decisions as to whether or not he releases information about meetings with private individuals or companies. [75187]

Dr. Jack Cunningham [holding answer 8 March 1999]: I refer to the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 168.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Discretionary Rate Relief

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each (a) metropolitan district council, (b) shire district council, (c) unitary council, (d) shire county council and (e) London borough council the sums of money in the 1999–2000 financial year they will be required to pay to the Government in respect of (i) discretionary rate relief and (ii) other grants issued in previous financial years. [74776]

Ms Armstrong: I have placed two tables in the Library. The first shows the amounts which local authorities have budgeted to pay into the non-domestic rates pool as a result of their own decisions to grant discretionary relief to businesses in 1999–2000. These payments ensure that the rates pool, and hence the amount to be redistributed to local authorities, is not adversely reduced by decisions taken by individual local authorities to reduce non-domestic rates bills for certain businesses. The table gives figures for each authority responsible for the billing and collection of non-domestic rates.

The second table shows the effect on local authorities in 1999–2000 of the Local Government Finance Report (England) 1997/1998: Amending Report 1999.

Housing Associations

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many housing associations received Government funding in (a) London, (b) the North West and (c) England as a whole in the last two years. [75264]

Mr. Raynsford: The number of housing associations receiving Government funding through the Housing Corporation's Approved Development Programme in 1997–98 and 1998–99 is shown in the table.

Number of housing associations receiving social housing grant through the Housing Corporation's approved development programme

Region	1997–98	1998–99
London	183	171
North West	57	56
England	548	500

Note:
1997–98 information is based on schemes given approval to start during the year
1998–99 information is based on start of year allocations

In addition, the Housing Corporation provides revenue funding to housing associations, eg Supported Housing Management Grant and Innovation and Good Practice grants. Housing associations also received funding from local authorities under the Local Authority Social Housing Grant scheme.

Mining Waste Disposal

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of safeguards on the disposal of mining waste. [75345]

Mr. Raynsford: The effectiveness of safeguards on the disposal of mining waste is kept under review by the Health and Safety Commission in respect of stability and safety, by the Environment Agency in respect of pollution aspects, and by the monitoring of planning permissions by local authorities. The comprehensive framework of UK legislation which deals with location, stability and safety, and the pollution potential of tips and related structures, has ensured that very few problems have arisen in recent years.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to change the rules on the disposal of inert mining waste. [75346]

Mr. Raynsford: There are no plans at present to change the rules for the disposal of inert mining waste. There are, however, proposals for new quarries health and safety regulations which will include safety and stability of tips. These would not lead to any diminution of health and safety standards at quarries.

Housing Stock Transfers

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when he proposes to announce the next round of approval for housing stock transfers; and if he will make a statement; [75466]

(2) what representations he has received regarding housing stock transfers; [75467]

(3) how many applications his Department has received for housing stock transfers in the last year for which figures are available. [75465]

Ms Armstrong: I am today announcing the names of the 25 local authorities which will be able to proceed, on a voluntary basis and subject to the approval of their tenants, with proposals to carry out 31 transfers of all or part of their housing stock to Registered Social Landlords (RSLs) in 1999–2000. The programme will involve over 140,000 dwellings in large-scale voluntary transfers, generating capital receipts of over £822 million. Nine of the transfers will be supported by Estates Renewal Challenge Funding.

Transfers can offer significant benefits for tenants. The new landlord must plan for proper maintenance and future repairs. Increased investment means that any backlog of repairs can be carried out more quickly than if the properties had remained in local authority ownership. Rent increases are normally limited by a guarantee that rents will not rise by more than 1 per cent. above inflation for the first five years. In addition, RSLs are regulated by the Housing Corporation, a government body which requires RSLs to adhere to performance standards in areas such as housing management, tenant consultation, and rents.

But housing transfers are voluntary and may take place only if tenants are in favour. The consent of the Secretary of State is also required before a transfer can proceed and will not be granted if it appears that a majority of tenants do not wish the transfer to proceed.

The 1999–2000 programme reflects the Government's commitment to support a continuing programme of transfers as a means of generating private finance to repair and improve the condition of social housing.

Both Coventry (20,349) and Tameside (16,959) are above the Department's size limit for transfers to one landlord. I am agreeing to proposals to transfer their stock to new group structure landlords involving, in each case, two asset owning RSLs.

Two of the authorities on the 1999–2000 programme—Coventry City Council and Burnley Borough Council—expect to have housing debt remaining in their Housing Revenue Account (HRA) after their stock is transferred. This is because the capital receipt will not be sufficient to clear all of the debt in their HRA. Transfer will depend on the successful resolution of this issue. We plan to issue a consultation paper on how to tackle overhanging debt in the near future. Our objective is to enable as wide a range of authorities to consider transfer as possible.

The authorities who have successfully gained a place on the programme, together with the intended recipient RSL are as follows:

(a) a disposal by Boston Borough Council of not more than 5,114 dwelling-houses to Boston Mayflower;

(b) a disposal by Burnley Borough Council of not more than 5,354 dwelling-houses to Burnley and Padiham Community Housing;

(c) disposals by Coventry City Council of not more than 20,349 dwelling-houses to registered social landlords;

(d) a disposal by Elmbridge Borough Council of not more than 5,022 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(e) a disposal by Fenland District Council of not more than 4,445 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(f) disposals by London Borough of Hackney of not more than 1,263 dwelling-houses on the Pembury estate to the Peabody Trust, and not more than 1,131 dwelling-houses on the Stamford Hill estate to the Stamford Hill Trust;

(g) a disposal by Huntingdonshire District Council of not more than 7,134 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(h) disposals by London Borough of Islington of not more than 646 dwelling-houses on the Barnsbury estate to Newlon Housing Group, and not more than 739 dwelling-houses on the Ten Estates to the Peabody Trust;

(i) disposals by London Borough of Lambeth of not more than 2,576 dwelling-houses on the Central Stockwell estate to Hyde Southbank Homes, and not more than 1,282 dwelling-houses on the St. Martins estate to South London Family Housing Association, Metropolitan Housing Trust and Presentation Housing Association;

(j) a disposal by London Borough of Lewisham of not more than 7,213 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(k) a disposal by Liverpool City Council of not more than 4,685 dwelling-houses to South Liverpool Housing;

(l) disposals by Manchester City Council of not more than 646 dwelling-houses on the Colshaw Farm estate to Riverside Housing Association, and not more than 1,036 dwelling-houses on the Whitefield estate to a registered social landlord;

(m) a disposal by Newcastle-under-Lyme Borough Council of not more than 10,042 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(n) a disposal by New Forest District Council of not more than 5,883 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(o) a disposal by North Devon District Council of not more than 3,462 dwelling-houses to North Devon Homes;

(p) a disposal by Preston Borough Council of not more than 1,123 dwelling-houses on the Avenham estate to Collingwood Housing Association;

(q) a disposal by Restormel District Council of not more than 3,781 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(r) a disposal by London Borough of Richmond of not more than 8,780 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(s) disposals by Tameside Metropolitan Borough Council of not more than 16,959 dwelling-houses to registered social landlords;

(t) a disposal by Test Valley Borough Council of not more than 5,789 dwelling-houses to Testway Housing Ltd.;

(u) a disposal by London Borough of Tower Hamlets of not more than 1,780 dwelling-houses in Poplar to Poplar HARCA;

(v) a disposal by Tynedale Council of not more than 3,731 dwelling-houses to Tynedale Housing Ltd.;

(w) a disposal by West Lindsey District Council of not more than 3,919 dwelling-houses to West Links Housing Ltd.;

(x) a disposal by Weymouth and Portland Council of not more than 3,526 dwelling-houses to a registered social landlord;

(y) a disposal by Wyre Forest District Council of not more than 6,440 dwelling-houses to Wyre Forest Community Housing.

Construction Standards

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the buildmark and related construction standards. [75505]

Mr. Raynsford: Buildmark is a housing warranty scheme run by the NHBC, but I keep closely in touch with the steps being taken by them aimed at reducing the incidence of defects in new housing and at improving the procedures for resolving problems when they arise. My Department is represented on the NHBC Committee which keeps under review the technical standards drawn up in support of the Buildmark scheme. My Department also maintains contact with the other main providers of housing warranties.

Development Projects

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many new housing developments have been based on public design competitions in the last five years; and if he will make a statement on the role of urban design guidance in promoting such developments. [75506]

Mr. Raynsford: No data are collected by the Government on design competitions. A number of such competitions—approximately 20–25 per year, 4 or 5 of which involve new housing developments—are run by the Royal Institute of British Architects for a variety of public and private clients. The guidance used to conduct many of these competitions is issued by my Department together with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, entitled "Architectural Competitions: A Handbook for Promoters" (1996). A copy of this publication is in the Library.

Forthcoming good practice guidance on design in the planning system will promote design competitions as a useful mechanism for achieving better quality housing development.

Roundabouts (Lighting)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will remove the absolute requirement for roundabouts to be lit where they are situated in sensitive rural locations. [75101]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 8 March 1999]: There is no absolute requirement to light roundabouts. It is for the highway authority to decide whether to light, based on their assessment of the benefits to be gained and the potential adverse environmental impact.

Good design, installation and maintenance practices can do much to reduce the adverse environmental impacts of street lighting. My Department has issued advice on this subject in "Road Lighting and the Environment" and, with the Countryside Commission, has published a guide "Lighting in the Countryside: Towards Good Practice". The Highways Agency's Design Manual for Roads and Bridges contains advice on lighting rural roundabouts, which is to be supplemented following research.

Void Local Authority Properties

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of local authority properties are void in (i) Bolton, (ii) the North West and (iii) England. [75636]

Mr. Raynsford: The proportion of local authority dwellings which were reported as void on 1 April 1998 was 1.8 per cent. in Bolton, 3.7 per cent., in the North West region and 2.5 per cent. in England.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the numbers of void social housing properties by housing authority in England and Wales. [75540]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 9 March 1999]: I have placed the information requested in the form of a table in the Library. The table presents the latest information on the number of vacant dwellings owned by each local housing authority in England, as reported by them at 1 April 1998, and gives equivalent estimates for stock owned by Registered Social Landlords (RSLs) in those districts at 31 March 1998. The latter are based on information supplied by RSLs to the Housing Corporation.

Corresponding information for Welsh housing authorities is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Carlisle Airport

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment of the future role of Carlisle airport he plans to include in his proposed statement on UK airport policy; and if he will make a statement. [75532]

Ms Glenda Jackson: As foreshadowed in a "New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone" (Cm3950), DETR has recently commission, in conjunction with the Government Offices for the North West, North East and Yorkshire and the Humber, a Regional Air Services Study for the North of England. This will include an assessment of the future role of Carlisle airport within the UK's airport system, its potential for meeting the demand for air services in Cumbria, Dumfries and Galloway and the Scottish Borders and the economic, environmental and social costs and benefits of doing so.

Near-miss Air Incidents

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what procedures are in place to investigate near-miss air incidents. [75706]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Under Article 106 of the Air Navigation (No. 2) Order 1995, controllers and pilots report airproxes (near miss) in which they were involved to the UK Airprox Board (UKAB), an independent organisation funded by the Civil Aviation Authority and the MOD.

Incidents involving commercial air transport, or which occur in controlled airspace, are passed to the CAA's Safety Regulation Group (SRG) for investigation. Where military aircraft are also involved, a separate investigation into the military aspects is conducted by the MOD. Once completed, the MOD's investigation report is sent to the SRG to be amalgamated with their own report of the incident.

Incidents which only involve military aircraft are referred to the MOD for investigation. The UKAB themselves conduct investigations of incidents involving general aviation in uncontrolled airspace.

SRG and the MOD forward their completed airprox incident reports to the UKAB which then independently assesses the degree of collision risk; and makes any necessary safety recommendations. The results are published.

In addition, the Chief Inspector of Air Accidents, who reports directly to the Secretary of State, has the right on any occasion to institute an investigation by the Air Accidents Investigation Branch (AAIB). The AAIB reports are published in due course.

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department will be conducting a full investigation into the near-miss incident involving a Boeing 737 and a Gulfstream Jet over Chigwell on 26 February. [75705]

Ms Glenda Jackson: DETR's Air Accident Investigation Branch (AAIB) has begun an investigation of this incident and the results will be published in due course.

In addition to the AAIB investigation, the Civil Aviation Authority's Safety Regulation Group (SRG) is carrying out its own investigation. Once completed, the SRG report is passed to the independent UK Airprox Board (UKAB) for its review and assessment of the incident.

The UKAB will also publish its findings. These will include an assessment of the degree of collision risk and any appropriate safety recommendations.

SSAs (Snow Days)

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the weather station sites and the respective local authorities in England which are used in the calculation of snow days for the purposes of the standard spending assessment. [75518]

Ms Armstrong: Information about the weather stations used in the calculation of the number of snow-lying days for the purpose of standard spending assessments has been placed in the Library.

Haulage Companies

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what initiatives his Department is taking to provide assistance to the British haulage industry. [75759]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 9 March 1999]: The Government want a road haulage industry that is safe, competitive, efficient and sustainable. On 2 March we published Sustainable Distribution: A Strategy, which sets out our approach and the range of initiatives which we will be taking forward to assist the haulage industry to meet these aims. The initiatives include integration of the sustainable transport of goods with our planning and roads policies; improvements in safety and enforcement which will benefit the law-abiding majority of the industry; and the promotion of best practice.

Planning

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the average times taken for planning applications to be processed by each planning authority in the last year for which figures are available. [75302]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 10 March 1999]: The information needed to determine the average time for planning applications to be processed is collected centrally only for a small number of mainly minerals and waste development applications (known as 'county matters'). These represent less than 1 per cent. of all applications and include some large, complex and contentious applications which tend to raise difficult planning issues that take some time to resolve. Information on the average time taken to determine this category of applications for the year ending September 1998 is shown in the table.

The speed at which decisions are made for the vast majority of applications, i.e. all except 'county matters', is measured in terms of the proportion of decisions determined within 8 weeks and 13 weeks. In the year ending September 1998, 62 per cent. of these applications in England were determined within 8 weeks and 83 per cent. within 13 weeks.

The Department is currently considering whether average time taken to determine applications should be included in the suite of Best Value performance indicators on which the Department will be consulting later this year.

Press Cuttings

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which company provides his Department with daily press cuttings on (i) environment issues, (ii) transport issues and (iii) local and regional Government issues; and if he will make a statement. [76040]

Mr. Meale: Press cuttings covering a broad range of the Department's responsibilities are supplied on a daily basis by Energy Data Services Ltd.

National Air Traffic Services

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he plans to sell a majority share of National Air Traffic Services in a public-private partnership; and if he will make a statement. [76067]

Dr. Reid: The Government are currently examining the responses received to the consultation paper on the proposal for a public-private partnership for National Air Traffic Services. A statement on the way forward will be made in due course.

Road Network (Hereford)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans (a) he and (b) Ministers in his Department have to visit Hereford in the next six months to examine the road network. [75682]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My noble Friend the Minister for Roads and Road Safety proposes to visit Hereford later this month.

Right of Access

Mrs. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the framework within which appeals can be lodged against decisions made during any mapping exercise prior to legislation on the right of access to open countryside. [76026]

Mr. Meacher: The Government are giving consideration to the procedures for appeals in relation to mapping. No decisions have yet been taken on these.

Airport Policy

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for airport studies in support of the development of the Government's airport policy. [76589]

Dr. Reid: The White Paper "A New Deal for Transport" (Cm 3950) announced the Government's intention to prepare a UK airports policy looking some 30 years ahead. The White Paper also announced a series of studies of the role of regional airports in the South West, the Midlands, and the North of England, Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland. These studies are all now under way.

To complement these studies, the Government have decided to set in hand a study of airport issues in the South East of England and the East of England. This study will consider future policies for these airports within the framework of the Government's sustainable development principles. It will take full account of the potential for airports in the other parts of the country to attract a greater proportion of the demand from their local area than they do at present, in accordance with the policy set out in the White Paper (paragraph 3.196).

The study will examine a wide range of options, and, in accordance with the new approach to appraisal set out in the White Paper, will appraise their economic, environmental and social implications. The study will consider both terminal and runway capacity. Projects for which planning applications have already been made, or are expected to be made shortly, will not be within the scope of the study. The Secretary of State must reserve his position on such cases, and cannot prejudge their outcome; the study will therefore examine a range of scenarios based on those projects either going ahead or not going ahead.

In accordance with our integrated transport policy, the study will consider not only airport capacity, but also the implications of possible developments for the planning of airspace capacity and air traffic control and for surface access to the airports concerned. The study will take account of work which the Department has recently commissioned from OPRAF to examine the scope for improving long distance rail links to the major South East airports and the rail connections between those airports.

This work will be carried out in an open way. In particular, the Government recognise the substantial economic, environmental and social implications of runway capacity issues, and their interaction with land-use planning. The Government will therefore discuss with interested parties, including the regional planning conferences and regional development agencies, the process for taking forward the study, including the criteria which should be applied in the assessment of options.

The Government expect that the studies will take around two years. There will then be public consultation on options arising from this work. The Government envisage that the results of the airport studies will be incorporated in a White Paper on UK airports policy, which will also reflect the Government's decisions in response to the Inspector's report on the Heathrow Terminal 5 Inquiry.

Greater London Authority Elections

Mrs. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for the voting and counting arrangements for the Greater London Authority elections on 4 May 2000. [76729]

Mr. Raynsford: I am pleased to announce that today we have sent an advertisement to the Office of the Official Journal for publication in "Tenders Electronic Daily" inviting expressions of interest from companies which could provide electronic voting equipment. This would enable votes in the first Greater London Authority elections to be electronically recorded and counted.

The new Authority will be modern, streamlined and efficient and we should work towards a voting system to match. This is particularly appropriate as the ballots for electing the Mayor and two types of Assembly Member require a more complex count than for most elections in this country. It is right, therefore to explore whether modern technology could improve the speed and efficiency of the process.

However, our top priority is to run a successful election on 4 May 2000, so we will be looking at systems which have proved extremely reliable in national or regional elections elsewhere. We will not therefore be committed to the use of electronic voting systems unless we are confident that the equipment offered will be easy for people to use, be value for money and make a real contribution to the success of the elections.

Local Government Act 1972

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to conduct research into local councils' and authorities' use of section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972. [76771]

Ms Armstrong: Section 137 is used by an increasing number of parish and town councils to provide a wide range of activities. The majority of section 137 spending by local councils is on grants to other bodies and funding for services such as youth activities, schools and playgroups. The findings of a study on local councils use of section 137 was published in November last year.

Furthermore, my Department has today published a report on local authorities use of section 137. The report found that while section 137 provides essential flexibility, authorities perceived that there are barriers to its use, such as the current financial limit on expenditure.

We are currently considering the best approach which will allow local authorities to carry out a new duty to promote the economic, social and environmental well being of their communities. Section 137 will be reviewed in the light of this new duty and we will take account of the findings of this report and the views of local authorities in doing so.

TREASURY

Unemployment

Mr. Brady: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department made of the average duration of unemployment for a person unemployed and claiming benefit in each of the last four years. [75668]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 9 March 1999]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Graham Brady, dated 11 March 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the average duration of unemployment.

Monthly estimates of median durations of uncompleted spells of claimant unemployment can be accessed by the House of Commons Library. The data are not readily available in precise annual form, but these monthly figures for each year average out as follows:

Estimated median duration of uncompleted spells of claimant unemployment, United Kingdom

	Weeks
1995	33
1996	33
1997	27
1998	22

These figures relate to computerised claims only i.e. they exclude a small proportion of claimants whose benefit claims are processed clerically.

Parliamentary Questions

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the cost of answering (a) a written parliamentary question and (b) an oral parliamentary question. [76588]

Dawn Primarolo: As at April 1998, the average costs of answering a written parliamentary question and an oral parliamentary question were £115 and £267 respectively.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ascension Island

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the bulk oil storage arrangements for the Ascension Island. [75638]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I have been asked to reply.

The present bulk fuel storage arrangements at Ascension Island are provided by the MV Maersk Ascension. Following a review of strategic fuel holdings on Ascension Island, my Department is considering the optimum arrangements for the future storage of fuel stocks.

Gibraltar

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations and at what level have been made to (a) the Government of Spain and (b) the European Commission in respect of the obstruction by the Government of Spain of free movement between Spain and Gibraltar. [76065]

Ms Quin: We have raised the border delays between Gibraltar and Spain on several occasions. In the last month, the Prime Minister has discussed the problem twice with Sr Aznar. The Foreign Secretary has done so twice with his Spanish counterpart. The Ambassador in Madrid has also raised the issue several times with the Spanish authorities, including with Sr Matutes. The UK Permanent Representative to the European Union has also written both to the President of the European Commission and to his Chef de Cabinet informing them of Spanish actions.

China (Human Rights)

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom intends to sponsor a resolution on China's human rights record at the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. [76066]

Mr. Fatchett: We are discussing with our EU partners our policy on China at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

Congo-Brazzaville

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what restrictions exist on the purchasing or moving of arms directly or indirectly through agents, or other parties in the United Kingdom or its overseas territories by those seeking to overthrow the current regime in Congo-Brazzaville. [76138]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: There is no UN or EU arms embargo in place against Congo-Brazzaville. However, irrespective of the intended destination, all applications for an individual licence to export from the UK arms or other military equipment entered in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, are considered against the criteria announced by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29, and the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports, adopted on 8 June. At present, as noted in the Government's White Paper on Strategic Export Controls, published in July 1998, HMG can control trafficking and brokering only where this is necessary to implement a binding UN resolution. However, the White Paper proposed the extension of the controls on trafficking and brokering in several areas, including to countries subject to other types of embargo, eg imposed as a result of non-binding UN resolutions or EU or OSCE decisions or nationally.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy in relation to the restoration to power in Congo-Brazzaville of Pascal Lissouba. [76139]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The UK wishes to see the initiation of an inclusive political process in Congo-Brazzaville. This would allow reconciliation and the return of all parties, including Pascal Lissouba, to participate in national reconstruction. We have urged all parties to the conflict to show restraint, and fully support UN Security Council Resolution 867 (1997) which calls for the withdrawal of foreign troops from Congo-Brazzaville.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings or communications Foreign Office Ministers or officials have had with Pascal Lissouba since he commenced his exile from Congo-Brazzaville. [76141]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: No Foreign Office Minister has met Pascal Lissouba since his exile. FCO officials met him on 20 April and 26 June 1998 and on 10 March 1999 to hear his views on the situation on Congo-Brazzaville.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if ex-President Lissouba has been issued with documents or letters of support from Her Majesty's Government supporting or facilitating his return to office; and if he will make a statement. [76142]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: On 9 November 1998, ex-President Lissouba wrote to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister requesting support. In a reply on 28 November 1998, a No. 10 official reaffirmed HMG's hopes that a process of political reconciliation would be initiated in Congo-Brazzaville, noted that this would allow all parties to return to participate in a project of national reconstruction and also urged all sides to exercise restraint.

I am placing a copy of this letter in the Libraries of the House.

Chevening

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) when he proposes to answer the question tabled by the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex on 22 February (ref. 72965) relating to the use of Chevening; [76039]

(2) when he proposes to answer the question tabled by the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex on 23 February (ref. 73515) relating to Chevening. [76038]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 9 March 1999, Official Report, columns 178–79.

SCOTLAND

Waiting Lists

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement anent waiting lists in (a) Inverclyde and (b) Scotland as a whole. [69797]

Mr. Galbraith: On 31 December 1998, the number of patients waiting for inpatient and day case treatment at Inverclyde Royal NHS Trust was 2,083. On that date, the number of patients on the inpatient/day case waiting list in Scotland was 78,526, a reduction of 7.5 per cent. on the position at 30 September 1998.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Student Loans

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many loans to students have been made by the Student Loans Board (Scotland); what is the total value of the loans; how many (a) have been fully repaid, indicating the total sum repaid, (b) are in the process of being repaid, indicating the total sum so far repaid and (c) have made no repayment, indicating the total sum involved. [74405]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 9 March 1999]: The Student Loans Company Limited administers student loans for all UK students. The Scottish funding of loans and share of loan receipts is based on a notional split of the UK total which is approximately 11 per cent. The information is set out in the tables in respect of that proportion of the UK total which is deemed to be attributable to Scottish students studying throughout the UK.

Table 1: Loans made to students by the Student Loans Company Limited and their total value

	Number/Value
Number of loans issued	442,879
Value of loans issued	£423 million

1a. Number of loans fully repaid and the total sum repaid.

Number of loans fully repaid: 13,069.

It is not possible to disaggregate the repayments attributable to these loans from the total repayments shown in tables 1b and 1c.

Table 1b: Loans in the process of being repaid, and the total sum repaid to date

	Number/Value
Accounts in repayment	36,681
Total sum repaid	£35 million

Table 1c: Number of students who have made no repayment and the total sum involved

	Amount/Value
Number of loans due to repay where no repayment received	2,937
Amount outstanding	£1.54 million

Universities (Drop-out Rate)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the drop-out rate at Scottish universities in each year between 1995–96 and 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [74560]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 4 March 1999]: There are no reliable estimates of the drop-out rate at Scottish universities available. However, methods are being developed to measure progression as part of the current work on Performance Indicators. The first information on progression will be published this summer.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Women's Aid

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the Government's support for Women's Aid and its plans for additional support in the future. [74885]

Mrs. Liddell: Our concern for the victims of domestic violence is reflected in Scottish Office funding of almost £220,000 this year to Scottish Women's Aid, the umbrella organisation for local women's groups. This consists of over £83,000 for work on developing refuge and permanent rehousing options for abused women who would otherwise be homeless, over £111,000 for the social welfare aspects of their work and £25,000 for training.

Because our advertising campaign has had an immediate impact on the demand for the services of Scottish Women's Aid, I announced on Monday 22 February the provision of extra one-off funding of £150,000 in the current financial year. Women's Aid intend using this to improve services and to publish leaflets at national level for the use of local groups dealing with inquiries.

We have committed £226,000 to Scottish Women's Aid for 1999–2000.

I have also established the Scottish Partnership on Domestic Violence which is charged with recommending minimum standards of services provision and looking at resources.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many constituents in Glasgow, Govan have been found places under the New Deal. [74883]

Nursing Homes (Waiting Lists)

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are currently on waiting lists for nursing home places in each local authority in Scotland. [74984]

Mr. Galbraith: This information is not held centrally.

Scottish Parliament (Tax-varying Powers)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what expenditure has been incurred to date on making preparations for the possible use of the tax-varying powers of the new Scottish Parliament; and if he will make a statement. [74563]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 5 March 1999]: There is a continuing project under way to put in place the mechanisms to enable the Scottish Parliament to implement its tax-varying powers from 1 April 2000. So far this has involved expenditure estimated at £2.5 million.

Higher Education (EU Undergraduate Students)

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of providing higher education for the non-British EU undergraduate students who studied at Scottish higher education institutions in 1996–97; and out of which departmental budget it was paid. [75003]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Institutions are funded through a number of block grants from the Scottish Higher Education Funding Council following allocation of grant from The Scottish Office. Costs of the delivery of education to individual students are not collected centrally. Estimates for the cost of providing higher education for non-British EU undergraduate at Scottish higher education institutions in 1996–97, based on average costs of any student, is £21.9 million.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes he intends to make to the cash limits and running costs provision for 1998–99 within his responsibility. [76565]

Mr. Dewar: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary revised Supplementary Estimates, I intend to make changes to 2 voted cash limits and 1 non-voted cash block. These changes are in addition to the amounts I announced in my written answer to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Dr. Clark), on 11 February 1999, Official Report, columns 372–74.

The cash limit for Class XIII, Vote 3, Education, industry, arts and libraries, Scotland will be increased by a net total of £5,404,000 from £1,704,433,000 to £1,709,837,000. The net increase takes account of additional provision to be made available for books for schools, as announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement, 9 March 1999, Official Report, columns 173–90.

The cash limit for Class XIII, Vote 5, Law, order and protective services, police grant and social work services, Scotland will be increased by £1,015,000. The cash limit has been increased by £1,015,000 from £677,087,000 to £678,102,000. The cash limit increase takes account of £830,000 for costs associated with the Lockerbie Trial in the Netherlands and £185,000 to meet the costs of training Returning Officers for the Scottish Parliamentary Elections.

The increases will be offset by transfers or charged to the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Forestry Commission

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list those contracts entered into by the Forestry Commission which allow motor vehicles to use Forestry Commission land for activities not related to timber; and if he will make a statement; [75572]

(2) what guidelines he has issued to the Forestry Commission on the involvement of the local community in decision-taking on the non-timber activities allowed on Forestry Commission land; and if he will make a statement; [75573]

(3) what commercial organisations, not involved in the production of timber, operate on Forestry Commission land. [75681]

Mr. Macdonald: The subjects of these questions relate to matters undertaken by Forest Enterprise. I have asked its Chief Executive, Dr. Bob McIntosh, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Bob McIntosh to Sir Robert Smith, dated 11 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Scotland has asked me to reply to your Question Nos 75572, 75573 and 75681, about activities on Forestry Commission land not related to timber.

The Forestry Commission encourages the pursuit of many different activities on its land, provided that these activities do not conflict with its other economic, social and environmental objectives. We give consent to a wide range of commercial organisations to operate on Commission land and a detailed list is not held centrally. In nearly all cases vehicular access is involved. The organisations include those involved in sporting, the provision of recreational facilities such as cycle hire, pony trekking, and four wheel drive hire, management training companies, operators of windfarms and transmission mast sites, film production companies involved in filming on FC land, motor rallies and rally driving schools.

The Commission has a Master Agreement with the Royal Automobile Motor Sports Association for motor rallies on its land. The Commission also has individual agreements with "quad bike" operators who hire out the use of all-terrain vehicles and with rally driving schools for car testing. We also allow our land to be used for special events such as "four by four" safaris by Motor Clubs and members of the public.

The Secretary of State has encouraged the Commission to involve local communities in the management of Forestry Commission land but has not issued any specific guidelines. The Commission has an Environmental Panel in each of its Forest Districts as a forum to consider our Forest Design Plans and discuss the management of local forests. Local communities are often represented on these panels and have an opportunity to make their views known on issues of local concern.

I hope I have answered the questions you have raised.

WALES

Agriculture

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met (i) NFU and (ii) FUW officials to discuss the problems of the agriculture industry. [74179]

Mr. Michael: I have had numerous meetings with representatives of the NFU, FUW and CLA to discuss the problems of the farming industry. I met the President of the CLA on 25 February. I met the NFU on Friday 12 February at Ty Mawr Farm, Llanbadoc, Usk to discuss a variety of agricultural issues. I also met my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Mr. Ruane) and a delegation of North Wales Farmers (including members of the FUW and the NFU) on 5 February at Hottia Farm, Dyserth, North Wales to discuss a variety of agricultural issues.

Members of all three organisations have attended several of the Question and Answer sessions I have held across Wales in recent weeks. The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), met the three farming unions on 15 February and prior to this he met the NFU at the Welsh NFU Forum on 2 February. He also met NFU and FUW representatives in Brussels on 23 February, together with other UK Agriculture Ministers, prior to a meeting of the EU Agriculture Council. I understand that arrangements are in hand for a meeting with my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Ms Lawrence) and the NFU.

School Transport

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list the statutory provisions which apply to the provision by local authorities of free school transport; [54016]

(2) what guidance his Department gives to local authorities on what constitutes an unsafe route for the purpose of providing free school transport. [74952]

Mr. Hain: Authorities are obliged under section 509(1) and (2) of the Education Act 1996 to make such arrangements for the provision of free transport as they consider necessary for the purpose of facilitating school attendance.

Parents have a defence under section 444 of the 1996 Act for not securing the regular attendance at school of children of compulsory school age if they live more than 2 miles from the nearest school (children under 8 years of age) or 3 miles away (older pupils) and the authority has made no suitable arrangements for the provision of free school transport.

The Courts have therefore ruled that free school transport should always be considered necessary under section 509(a) if children live more than 2 or 3 miles, as appropriate, from the nearest school. In other circumstances the need for free school transport has to be decided by local authorities in the light of local conditions and priorities.

When considering whether free school transport is necessary, authorities must, among other things, have regard, by virtue of section 509(4) of the 1996 Act, to the nature of the route, or alternative routes, that a child could reasonably be expected to take. Authorities should also have regard under section 509(4) to the age of the child and any parental wish for denominational education.

Whether or not a route is safe in the context of the provision of free school transport is a matter for authorities to decide. However, Welsh Office Circular 19/95, "Home To School Transport", points out that the Courts have held that a route to school is available if a child, accompanied as necessary, can walk along it with reasonable safety. A copy of the circular is in the Library of the House.

Local education authorities also have a power under section 509(3) of the 1996 Act to help with school transport costs in circumstances where they do not consider the provision of free school transport under 509(1) necessary.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

National Port Authorities

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those of his appointees currently serving on national park authorities who have military backgrounds. [75570]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones [holding answer 10 March 1999]: Two Secretary of State appointees to the Welsh National Park Authorities, Dr. John Menon and Mr. Warren Dean Martin, have, in the past, served with the military.

This information is based upon current Welsh Office records and was provided voluntarily by the members. Applicants are not specifically asked to provide details of their military backgrounds.

Following the transfer of functions, National Park public appointments that are currently the responsibility of the Secretary of State will be transferred to the National Assembly.

HEALTH

Organ Transplants

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received urging that the organs of all deceased persons should be available for transplant unless they have clearly stated otherwise; and if he will make a statement. [73326]

Mr. Hutton: There have been several Parliamentary Questions and a number of letters from hon. Members and members of the public on this subject. We are looking into a wide range of possible ways of increasing current levels of transplantation. The issues involved in this area are very sensitive, and any measures we introduce must command public confidence. We will therefore be giving the options for action very careful and thorough consideration.

Cancelled Operations

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library figures for each quarter in the past two years for (a) each health authority, (b) each NHS region and (c) England as a whole, listing the number of operations cancelled on (i) the day of or (ii) the day before admission to a hospital, stating the number of those patients not readmitted within a month. [75058]

Mr. Hutton: The figures requested are routinely placed in the Library every quarter. Copies of the latest figures have been placed in the Library today.

Worcestershire (Grants)

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (i) the names of the beneficiaries of all the discretionary grants awarded by his Department to organisations within Worcestershire during 1998, (ii) their monetary value, (iii) their total value and (iv) the proportion that that total sum comprises of the total sums awarded by his Department in discretionary grants in 1998. [75252]

Mr. Hutton: Discretionary grants totalling £4,235,276 have been awarded to organisations within Worcestershire during 1998–99; details are in the table. This represents 0.78 per cent. of the funds available to the Department for such grants. The figures exclude the Asylum Seekers' Grant because decisions on the claims submitted have not yet been taken.

Barnet Health Authority

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress in reducing hospital waiting lists by Barnet Health Authority. [75783]

Mr. Denham: At the end of January 1999, the waiting list in Barnet stood at 6,698. Barnet Health Authority's planned target for March 1999 is 5,846. Early indications show that significant progress was made during February 1999, with the Authority on course to achieve this target.

Breast Cancer

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has received from the Government's medical advisers on the probable impact of extending the routine call/recall element of the breast screening programme to women aged 65 to 69 years on (a) breast cancer detection rates and (b) breast cancer mortality rates. [75526]

Mr. Hutton: Interim results from one of the three pilot studies to test the feasibility of extending routine call/recall for breast screening to women aged 65 to 69 years showed breast cancer detection rates of 8 per thousand in women aged 65–67 and 17.4 per thousand in women aged 68 to 69. These results were published in the British Medical Journal on 8 August 1998. Copies of the Journal are available in the library. Previous evidence suggests that screening for breast cancer reduces mortality by 25 per cent. in both age groups.

West Pennine Health Authority (Mental Health)

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what extra resource allocation he has made to the West Pennine Health Authority from the additional spending on mental health for 1999–2000; [75536]

(2) if he will estimate the amount which would have been allocated to the West Pennine Health Authority from the additional spending on mental health funds for 1999–2000 on a purely per capita method of calculation; [75537]

(3) what were the criteria used for the allocation of the additional spending on mental health to health authorities. [75519]

Mr. Hutton: The West Pennine Health Authority received £30,000 as part of the directly allocated mental health element of the Modernisation Fund, which in 1999–2000 totalled £19.1 million.

Allocation to health authorities (HA) took account of three factors:

(a) identified service gaps in each

(b) the HA's need for mental health services based on a weighted population score;

(c) for London HAs recognition of the evidence of a higher level of need.

If the £19.1 million had been issued in line with the weighted capitation formula used to inform unified allocations, West Pennine Health Authority's hypothetical share would have been £185,000. However, this approach would not have been appropriate for distributing funds which we wished to target specifically to where they were most needed.

West Pennine Health Authority may benefit from centrally held budgets for mental health services yet to be allocated.

Restraint Techniques

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths have occurred in the United Kingdom as (a) direct and (b) indirect result of the use of control and restraint techniques by nurses in the last five years; and if he will give a breakdown by ethnicity of the deceased. [75949]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the control and restraint techniques used on mentally ill patients. [75957]

Mr. Hutton: A number of courses are available to train staff in methods of restraint and many units have developed in-house procedures to meet their particular needs. Information about the range of techniques is not available centrally.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 820, on the Norvic Clinic, if he will list the circumstances of each of the occasions between 2 November 1997 and 4 December 1998 when control and restraint techniques were applied by nursing staff at the Norvic Clinic, Norwich; and if he will provide a breakdown by ethnicity of the patients involved. [75959]

Mr. Hutton: Between 2 November 1997 and 4 December 1998 there were 45 occasions when control and restraint techniques were applied by nursing staff at the Norvic Clinic, Norwich. Of those 45 occasions, 36 involved a patient categorised as white; 8 involved black Afro-Carribean patients; and 1 involved a patient categorised as "black other".

Violence against Nurses

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many reported assaults, and other acts of violence there were against nurses in the workplace; and how many successful prosecutions of such assaults there were in each year since 1990; [75956]

(2) what action is being taken to ensure that nurses who are subject to violence in the workplace are supported in subsequent legal action. [75955]

Mr. Denham: We have made it very clear that violence against all staff working in the National Health Service is unacceptable. We expect employers in the National Health Service to establish close working relationships with the police and the Crown Prosecution Service so that staff can be assured that they will have the full force of the law behind them. We also expect local managers to provide whatever support is needed to help staff who are assaulted to recover, and also to advise and support them through any subsequent legal process.

Information on the number of reported assaults and other acts of violence against nurses in the workplace, and those that were successfully prosecuted is not available centrally.

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has had from (a) the Royal College of Nursing and (b) other bodies, regarding violence against nurses. [75952]

Mr. Denham: We have received representations from the Royal College of Nursing (RCN) and other health bodies including the Manufacturing, Sciences and Finance Union, the British Medical Association, UNISON and the National Health Service Confederation regarding violence against nurses.

That is why we launched the NHS Guidance, "Safer Working in the Community: A guide for NHS managers and staff on reducing the risks of violence and aggression" at the start of the RCN's joint campaign "Stamp out Violence" on the 28 October 1998, which we fully endorse.

The Government are determined to ensure that NHS staff who spend their lives caring for others are not rewarded with intimidation and violence. Violence to staff is unacceptable and will not be tolerated.

Health Care Teams

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards the Government's target of introducing three to five-year agreements between health care teams and hospitals. [76033]

Mr. Denham: Guidance issued in October 1998 set out how we expect health authorities, primary care groups and National Health Service trusts to work together and with social services, users and carers and others to develop and implement long-term service agreements.

All service agreements beginning April 1999 are to be set in the context of the longer-term relationships and objectives being established through health improvement programmes. Fully fledged long-term service agreements are to be developed through a rolling programme. The new primary care groups have been asked to aim to develop at least two such agreements for the period beginning April 1999.

Patients Charter

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards creating a new Patients Charter. [76032]

Mr. Denham: We asked Greg Dyke, Chairman of Pearson Television, to develop proposals for a new National Health Service Charter. His report "The New NHS Charter—A Different Approach" was published in December. We intend to undertake consultation on proposals taking account of the report in the near future.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Independent Complaints System

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to introduce an independent ombudsman or other independent complaints system for complaints about (a) QCs, (b) the Bar and (c) solicitors; and if he will make a statement. [75784]

Mr. Hoon: The Office of the Legal Services Ombudsman was established by the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 because of concern that complaints about the provision of legal services should be investigated properly and thoroughly. The Ombudsman, who is statutorily independent of Government and the legal profession, has powers, inter alia, to examine allegations and make certain recommendations concerning the handling of complaints against barristers and solicitors (including QCs) by their professional bodies.

Pro Bono Work

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to monitor the amount of pro bono work done by (a) barristers, (b) QCs and (c) solicitors; and if he will make a statement. [75785]

Mr. Hoon: The Government have no plans at present to monitor formally the amount of pro bono work carried out by the legal profession.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department to what extent, in considering the appointment of new QCs, the Lord Chancellor takes into account (a) the past record of the applicant's undertaking of pro bono work and (b) the willingness of the applicant, if appointed, to undertake pro bono work. [75787]

Mr. Hoon: Neither the undertaking of, nor a willingness to undertake, pro bono work is one of the published criteria for appointment. Where applicants highlight the extent of the pro bono work they have undertaken, this is treated as a part of their practice which is not reflected in their fee income.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department to what extent, in considering the appointment of new QCs and taking into account levels of earnings of applicants a discount is given against the levels of earnings to reflect pro bono work; and if he will make a statement. [75786]

Mr. Hoon: My noble and learned Friend considers applications for Queen's Counsel against published criteria. The application form, which applicants complete, requires them to give gross fee income for the last three years. The criteria require successful applicants to have a high quality practice, and the level of fee income is an indicator of size of practice. Applicants are also asked to state if the level of their fees has been affected by the nature of their, or their firm's practice. Where applicants highlight the extent of the pro bono work they have undertaken that is treated as part of their practice which does not reflect in their fee income.

Legal Aid System

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps he is taking to publicise the proposed reforms of the legal aid system in a manner accessible to potential users of the legal services, with particular reference to community legal services. [75512]

Mr. Hoon: The proposed reforms of the legal aid system have been publicised in the White Paper "Modernising Justice", published in December 1998, in a summary version which has been widely distributed and in press releases and media briefing in connection with the Access to Justice Bill. The proposals are also available on the internet.

My Department's press office has taken steps to publicise the proposals through the media in the six Community Legal Service Pioneer areas announced since December 1998 and will seek to arrange regional and national publicity when further Associate Pioneer ares are announced.

In addition, informing the public at grass roots level about the Community Legal Service is one of the key tasks being considered between my Department and the Pioneer area authorities and one which will also be considered with the Associate Pioneer area authorities.

Immigration Appeal Authority

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department how many regional adjudicators of the Immigration Appeal Authority have been suspended in the last 12 months; and for what reason. [76029]

Mr. Hoon: One Regional Adjudicator has been suspended in the last 12 months following a complaint from a member of staff.

Queen's Counsel

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the observations of Mr. Justice Lightman of 9 June 1998 concerning (a) the nature and effect of the patronage in the QC system, (b) the fees claimed by QCs and their official endorsement through legal aid scale fees and (c) seating arrangements in court. [75789]

Mr. Hoon: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has read the lecture, "Civil Litigation in the 21st Century", given by Mr. Justice Lightman to the Chancery Bar Association on 3 June 1998. He has no plans to make a statement.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Judicial Appointments

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department in each of the past four years, how many (a) QCs, (b) barristers and (c) solicitors were informally approached to see if they would accept, if offered, judicial appointment, in each case to (i) the High Court bench and (ii) the circuit bench; in each case, how many indicated they would, if offered an appointment at that time, decline it; and if he will make a statement. [75788]

Mr. Hoon: The table indicates the number, according to available Departmental records, of QCs in the last four years who (a) have been informally asked whether, if an offer were ever made, they would accept appointment to the High Court Bench; and (b) indicated that they would decline an offer of immediate appointment:

Year	Number asked	Number who would decline offer of immediate appointment	Number who accepted subsequently
1996	14	9	5

Of these, only 2 in 1995, 1 in 1996 and 2 in 1997 indicated that they would never accept appointment, and one of these has subsequently changed his mind. In 1996, one barrister was informally approached who indicated that he would accept appointment, if offered, and subsequently did so.

During the past four years, no solicitor has been approached, nor has any QC, barrister or solicitor been informally approached about appointment to the Circuit Bench.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Computer Purchases

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee what plans he has to reduce the costs to hon. Members of purchasing new computers through a bulk purchasing arrangement. [75902]

Mr. Allan: The Information Committee proposed, in its recently published report (The Supply of Members' Information Technology Equipment, Software and Associated Services (HC 1998–99, 76—Incorporating HC 1997–98, 856-i)) that there should be a central procurement option made available to Members at an early opportunity.

House Officials are currently negotiating prices for a range of suitable computer hardware and software, with a view to making equipment available to Members and Departments of the House at advantageous prices. The new arrangements are expected to be available in the first quarter of the new financial year.

The Stationery Office

Mr. Love: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, what monitoring of compliance by the Stationery Office with the contract to provide printing services has taken place since privatisation; when the contract is due for renewal; on what criteria the tendering process will be based; and if he will make a statement. [75815]

Mr. Kirkwood: The performance standards laid down in the current contract between the House and the Stationery Office (TSO) for the provision of printing services are monitored daily by the Vote Office, and senior House Officers meet regularly with the senior management of TSO to review performance and resolve problems. The contract will expire on 31 December 1999 unless the House exercises its option to extend the term for a limited period. With the approval of the Commission, the printing services covered by the contract have been put out to open tender in accordance with EU procedures, and expressions of interest are currently being evaluated. The relevant notice, which describes the award criteria, was published in the supplement to the Official Journal of the European Communities on 31 July 1998.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Freedom of Information

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to (a) encourage greater openness in the public sector and (b) prepare for legislation on freedom of information. [77107]

Mr. Straw: The Government's programme of constitutional reform seeks to involve people more closely in the decisions which affect their lives. Freedom of Information is a fundamental part of that process and should significantly transform the relationship between citizens and the state.

The Government hope to publish a draft bill on Freedom of Information in May. It will allow for a period of public consultation, as well as appropriate pre-legislative scrutiny by the Public Administration Committee of the House of Commons.

Legislation while necessary is, in itself, not sufficient. There is a substantial programme of work needed to create a culture of openness in all public services and lay the foundations for the implementation of a future Freedom of Information Act.

I have, therefore, established the Advisory Group on Openness in the Public Sector to advise me on the steps needed to be taken ahead of legislation. The group, which has already had an informal meeting to discuss its programme of work, is being chaired by Lord Williams and the membership is drawn from a variety of backgrounds. Some bring a specialist knowledge of an area of public service to the Group's work, while others have a particular interest in Freedom of Information. Details of the membership of the Group are being placed in the Library.

The Group's terms of reference are:

"To advise the Home Secretary on proposals for promoting cultural change in the public sector to foster a culture of greater openness.

To assist in the development of training and education programme for public servants to promote cultural change and facilitate the introduction of Freedom of Information.

To undertake other tasks related to the implementation of Freedom of Information as directed by the Home Secretary".

Copies of papers considered by the Group and the minutes of its meetings will be available through my Department's web site on the Internet. I expect the Group to submit a report to me before the end of the year making recommendations on how I might facilitate an increase in openness in the public sector as a whole.

In the meantime, the Government are taking action now to extend openness and accountability. On 10 February, Her Majesty in Council approved an Order extending the jurisdiction of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration to an additional 111 executive non departmental public bodies and 47 advisory non departmental public bodies, with effect from 15 March. By bringing these bodies within the Ombudsman's jurisdiction, this Order has the effect of bringing them within scope of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

The Code of Practice commits public bodies to:

give facts and analysis with major policy decisions;

open up internal guidelines about dealings with the public; and give reasons with administrative decisions; and provide information about their service to the public (their costs targets and performance and information about complaints and redress).

The Code also sets out how public bodies should respond to specific requests for information from members of the public. The approach to the release of information is based on the assumption that information should be released except where disclosure would not be in the public interest. In the period before a Freedom of Information Act comes into force, the Government are committed to using the flexibility and discretion available under the Code to release as much information as possible.

Criminal Offences (EU)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress of Council Document 5202/98; and to which provisions his Department objects. [76299]

Kate Hoey: The United Kingdom Presidency consulted the European Parliament in January 1998 on the text in Council Document 5202/98 of the draft Convention on mutual assistance in criminal matters between the member states of the European Union. Two of the Parliament's proposed amendments have been incorporated into the draft. The Convention has been further developed and negotiations are continuing. The most recent consolidated text is in Council Document 13144/98, which was submitted to the Select Committee on European Scrutiny last January with an Explanatory Memorandum giving details of the Government's negotiating position. Copies are in the Library. The Government attach importance to the Convention, but have concerns about the scope and detail of the provisions on interception of telecommunications.

Open Prisons (Former Inmates)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the number and type of offences committed by those who have absconded from open prisons in the past five years. [76297]

Mr. George Howarth: Prior to 1 April 1997, no central information is available that provides details of any further offences committed while unlawfully at large. This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

From 1 April 1997, prison establishments have been responsible for reporting details of absconds and returns to lawful custody, along with any known further offences to Prison Service headquarters. The accuracy of the information available cannot be guaranteed as prisons are not always aware of offences committed while a prisoner is unlawfully at large, and such offences may not come to light until some time after the prisoner's return to custody.

The available information from 1 April 1997 is given in the tables.

Schengen Agreement

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government plans to sign up to elements of the Schengen

Agreement at the forthcoming Justice and Home Affairs Council; which elements are concerned; and what representations he has received on this matter. [75722]

Mr. Straw: I have today made the following statement to the Justice and Home Affairs Council in Brussels.

Other member states will be interested to know of the intentions of the United Kingdom about our participation in JHA matters after the entry into force of the Treaty of Amsterdam, in accordance with Article 4 of the Protocol integrating the Schengen acquis into the framework of the European Union and by the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland.

The United Kingdom is committed to active and effective co-operation in the JHA field. We demonstrated that during our Presidency last year. Our citizens have a common interest in ensuring that effective action is taken to combat international organised crime; we shall continue to play a full role in such European union level co-operation. We have been playing an active part in preparation for the incorporation of Schengen and for the establishment of the new Free Movement Chapter under Amsterdam. We are also keen to assist in the development of a useful agenda for the special European Council in Tampere later this year.

We have been giving serious thought to the areas of the Schengen acquis and the measures to be adopted under the Title IV in which we would wish to participate once Amsterdam comes into force. The different effects of our various Protocols influences our approach in this respect.

Our starting point is the Protocol on frontier controls to which all member states agreed at Amsterdam. The United Kingdom Government will maintain their former controls, in line with that political agreement.

Subject to the Amsterdam Protocol, the United Kingdom wishes to approach participation in Schengen and the Free Movement Chapter positively. Indeed we are keen to engage in co-operation in all areas of present and future JHA co-operation which do not conflict with our frontiers control.

We are therefore ready to participate in law enforcement and criminal judicial co-operation derived from the Schengen provisions, including the Schengen Information System. We have been in the forefront of European Union co-ordination in the fight against crime and drugs and we shall maintain that position. We are also interested in developing co-operation with European Union partners on asylum—a European Union-wide phenomenon—and in the civil judicial co-operation measures of the Free Movement Chapter.

Our intention to maintain our frontier controls has implications for our participation in the direct operation of external frontier controls. For similar reasons, enhanced visa co-operation raises difficulty for us. But, within this constraint, we shall seek discussions with European Union colleagues to maximise the scope for mutual operational co-operation in combating illegal immigration, without prejudice to the maintenance of our national immigration controls. We shall also look to participation in immigration policy where it does not conflict with our frontiers-based system of control.

We realise that much detailed discussion with our European Union partners will be necessary in order to pave the way for co-operation in these areas. We shall shortly put forward a formal request for participation.

Lighter Fuel Refills

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information his Department has collated on the number of deaths, broken down by age group, arising from misuse of lighter fuel refills in each of the last three years. [75471]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

Information for 1997 and 1998 is not yet available. Data for 1994 to 1996 are given in the table.

Countryside Stewardship Scheme

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many applications were received in Wales during 1998 to join the Countryside Stewardship Scheme; what area of land they represented; how many were approved; and what area of land they represented; [76096]

(2) what is the total area of land in Wales covered by the Countryside Stewardship Scheme; and what is the area covered by the scheme within the less favoured areas and its proportion of the total LFA area; [76092]

(3) what the total budget allocated to the Countryside Stewardship Scheme in Wales is in each of the next three years. [76094]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The Countryside Stewardship Scheme is not available in Wales.

PRIME MINISTER

Foreign Affairs Committee

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Prime Minister when (a) he, (b) his officials, (c) his advisers and (d) his parliamentary private secretary were first made aware of the leaked

Foreign Affairs Committee documents on (i) its Human Rights inquiry and (ii) its European Union enlargement inquiry. [75862]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 10 March 1999]: My office was made aware on Wednesday 3 March. I was told the same day.

Al Shifa Factory

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Prime Minister what discussion he has had with the Sudanese Government as to their version of the purpose of the factory bombed by the United States with the support of the United Kingdom. [76446]

The Prime Minister: FCO officials have been in regular contact with the Government of Sudan following our withdrawal from Khartoum last August.

We continue to encourage Sudan to become a party to the Chemical Weapons Convention which prohibits the acquisition, development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons and is supported by a verifications regime consisting of data declarations and on-site inspections.

The Sunday Telegraph

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Prime Minister (1) for what reasons he approved the decision of the Home Secretary on 20 February to seek an injunction against The Sunday Telegraph; and if he will make a statement; [76394]

(2) at what time on 20 February he was consulted by the Home Secretary on the injunction he proposed to apply for against The Sunday Telegraph; and if he will make a statement. [76393]

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 10 March 1999, Official Report, column 277. My right hon. Friend has explained fully the circumstances and events which led him to seek an injunction in his oral statement to the House on 22 February 1999, Official Report, columns 21–22.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Maritime and Coastguard Agency

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the additional cost of introducing the ICCS system to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency while retaining the four coastguard stations due for closure. [75825]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The estimated additional cost to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency of introducing the ICCS system while retaining the four coastguard stations due for closure is in the order of £2 million. This includes additional capital and running costs associated with the system. However, there could also be additional estimate costs upwards to £1 million for new building works to accommodate the new equipment at least of the stations due for closure.

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for the former Maritime and Coastguard Agency office at Gosforth, Tyne and Wear. [75826]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency's Newcastle Marine Office currently occupies accommodation at Government's Buildings, Broadway West, Gosforth, Newcastle Upon Tyne under the terms of an inter Departmental Agreement with the Department of Social Security. MCA are currently exploring an option of vacating Broadway West site by the end of the year.

Maritime Rescue Subcentres

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many incidents were dealt with during 1998 by the Maritime Rescue subcentres at (i) Tyne Tees and (ii) Forth in which assistance was (a) rendered and (b) not rendered; and how many of the incidents were hoaxes. [75827]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In 1998, Tyne Tees MRSC dealt with (a) 274 incidents in which assistance was rendered and (b) 169 incidents in which assistance was not rendered. Seventeen incidents were hoaxes. For the same period, Forth MRSC dealt with (a) 167 incidents in which assistance was rendered and (b) 107 incidents in which assistance was not rendered. Four incidents were hoaxes.

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many incidents dealt with by the Tyne Tees Maritime Rescue subcentre in 1998 were (a) inshore and (b) offshore. [75824]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Applying a 3-mile limit to inshore incidents: Tyne Tees MRSC dealt with (a) 442 incidents inshore and (b) 18 incidents offshore in 1998.

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of (a) the number of people assisted, (b) the number of people rescued and (c) the number of lives lost during incidents dealt with in 1998 by the Maritime Rescue subcentres at (i) Tyne Tees and (ii) Forth. [75828]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In 1988 Tyne Tees MRSC (a) assisted 769 people, (b) rescued 136 people and (c) recorded 15 lives lost during incidents. For the same period, Forth MRSC (a) assisted 244 people, (b) rescued 177 people and (c) recorded 5 lives lost during incidents.

Warcop to Appleby Line

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out the arrangements agreed between Sustrans and the Eden Valley Railway Company as a condition of the sale of the Warcop to Appleby line. [76184]

Dr. Reid: The transfer to Sustrans of the Warcop to Appleby line was subject, as part of the Agreement with the British Railways Board, to an undertaking by Sustrans that it would reach an agreement with Eden Council and the Eden Valley Railway Trust for retention of the track and site sharing.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list all the bids made to purchase the Warcop to Appleby railway line. [76185]

Dr. Reid: No. Bids received by the British Railways Board for its land are commercially confidential.

British Waterways

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the external financing limit for the British Waterways Board. [77106]

Mr. Meale: The 1998–99 External Financing Limit for the British Waterways Board will be increased by £350,000 from £53,272,000 to £53,622,000. This will enable them to carry out additional major repairs to the canal network and other urgent maintenance. It will be funded by an increase in grant-in-aid to the Board arising from savings elsewhere on Class VI, Vote 3 and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

NORTHERN IRELAND

New Deal (South Down)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many people have registered for the New Deal at each social security office in South Down since its introduction; and of these how many were unemployed and in receipt of jobseeker's allowance or income support; [75227]

(2) how many people who registered for the New Deal at each social security office in South Down have obtained full-time employment. [75228]

Mr. Ingram: Responsibility for the matter has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Mr. Eddie McGrady, dated 10 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency (T&EA) to reply to your questions about New Deal in South Down as most New Deal registrations are taken at T&EA JobCentres. Social Security Offices take registrations for the New Deal for Lone Parents only.

The information you asked for is set out in the following table.

Jobcentre	Number of New Deal registrations	Number obtaining employment at 7 March 1999
Ballynahinch	138	30
Downpatrick	304	61
Kilkeel	111	25
Newcastle	195	39
Total	748	155

Information is not currently available on how many of these 155 jobs are full-time.

The majority of those who have registered remain within the Gateway stage of New Deal. The number of people moving into employment will of course rise as New Deal participants leave Gateway.

All clients who registered for the New Deals for Young People aged 18–24 and for those aged over 25 were unemployed and in receipt of Jobseekers Allowance at the time of registration. Those registering for the New Deal for Lone Parents were unemployed and in receipt of Income Support.

I hope this reply is helpful.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Entry Charges

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proposals he has to assist those galleries which do not currently charge for admission. [74501]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The grant-in-aid allocations announced by my right hon. Friend on 14 December 1998, Official Report, columns 589–90, were designed to enable the non-charging national museums and galleries to continue to offer free admission.

The Government do not in general provide revenue funding for other non-charging museums, but other current initiatives should help—notably the Designated Museums Challenge Fund, which will make £15 million available over the next 3 years to the 50 non-national museums in England with collections of pre-eminent importance, and the challenge fund of £0.5 million in each of the next two years which is intended to promote education and IT initiatives in registered museums.

In addition, registered museums are encouraged to apply to the Heritage Lottery Fund's £7 million Museums and Galleries Access Fund, which is intended to assist with access initiatives throughout the sector.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proportion of the funds allocated by his Department to remove charges for entry to museums and galleries is planned to be made available to those institutions which do not currently charge. [74500]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The extra funding for the non-charging museums represents 44 per cent. in 1999–2000, and 30 per cent. in 2000–01, of the total amount made available to promote access at the national museums and galleries. Decisions about the funding of free access in 2001–02 have not yet been taken.

Millennium Dome (Insurance)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 535, what is the size of the annual premium paid to insure the Millennium Dome. [74731]

Janet Anderson: The New Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) insurance arrangements reflect the Company's best commercial judgment about the scope and nature of the project's risks and exposures, as well as meeting all relevant legal obligations. The arrangements do not involve payment of annual premiums but do involve a spread of premium payments across the life of the project taking into account the changing nature of type of cover needed as the project progresses. The detailed terms of the Company's insurance policy are commercially confidential; release of the details could adversely affect the Company's business relationship with its insurers, and future negotiations about the terms of the insurance.

Millennium Dome (Temperature)

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the ambient temperature in the Millennium Dome between the zones in January 2000. [75678]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 10 March 1999]: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) has undertaken detailed computational fluid dynamic studies of likely temperatures throughout the Dome, throughout the year of operation. There is an on-going review of these studies to identify any potential impact on the forecast comfortable temperatures of any detailed design changes within the Dome environment.

Millennium Dome (Construction Costs)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proportion of business sponsorship for the New Millennium Experience Company represents cash payments towards the construction costs. [75761]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 9 March 1999]: The sponsorship income component of the cash budget (£758 million) for the Millennium Experience project, agreed by the Government and the Millennium Commission in June 1997, is not linked specifically to individual expenditure components such as construction costs. No two sponsorship deals are exactly the same; some focus on individual zones within the Dome; others focus on particular strands of the Millennium Experience's National Programme; others combine the two. It is for the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC), in consultation with the Millennium Commission, to decide how, in its best commercial judgment to apply sponsorship support to meet the costs.

Millennium Dome (Ferry Services)

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what proposals he has evaluated for ferry services from (a) Instones Wharf, (b) Woolwich Arsenal and (c) Gallions Reach to the Millennium Dome; what discussions he has had with ferry operators; and if he will make a statement; [73532]

(2) what estimate he has made of the potential numbers of people who could be transported by water to the Millennium Dome from points to the east of the Greenwich Peninsula; [73534]

(3) what proposals he has evaluated for the provision of piers at (a) Albert Lock and (b) Barking to serve ferry operators taking passengers to the Dome. [73533]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 1 March 1999]: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) is constructing a new pier at the Dome site which is due for completion in July this year. The NMEC issued a tender document inviting bids for river services which identified routes from central London, from historic Greenwich and from points to the east of the Greenwich Peninsula. However, no bids were received for services from points to the east of Greenwich; only bids for the central London and historic Greenwich routes were received. Licences for those routes have now been awarded.

As part of its initial park and ride strategy NMEC did consider a pier option at Barking. However, no bids were received for river services from this area and the NMEC concluded that a new, temporary car park facility at Barking was not required to meet its park and ride objectives. NMEC is planning a park and ride, temporary car park at Woolwich which will be linked to the Dome by shuttle bus as the most efficient, flexible and economic means of accessing the Dome.

The response to the NMEC's tender processes so far indicate that the market does not consider a river boat service from the east of the peninsula to be viable on the basis of the likely number of users. The NMEC cannot fund or underwrite the costs of such a service but the Company would be happy to consider any fresh, financially viable proposal to accommodate at its pier a commercial river service bringing Dome visitors from points east of the Greenwich peninsula.

The number of visitors such a service could bring to the Dome would depend on the frequency of the service and the size of the craft but a boat service from a car park with 1,000 spaces would provide a potential demand of up to 3,000 people on a full capacity day at the Dome.

Thames Barrier

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans there are to raise the Thames barrier as part of the millennium celebrations. [73257]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 25 February 1999]: No formal proposals have been put forward by the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) to use the Thames Barrier to control the river's tide this New Year's eve.

The Thames Barrier and Flood Prevention Act 1972 defines the limited circumstances in which the Thames Barrier may be closed. Any proposals to raise the barrier would need to be studied closely by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (MAFF) against this legislation.

Alfred Hitchcock

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received concerning his Department's role in marking the 100th anniversary of the birth of Alfred Hitchcock. [75940]

Janet Anderson: We have received a number of representations from the London Borough of Waltham Forest seeking the Department's support for the Borough's plans to mark the centenary of Alfred Hitchcock's birth. Although the Department will not be directly involved, I understand that the British Film Institute will shortly be announcing wide ranging plans to celebrate the life and work of Sir Alfred Hitchcock.

TREASURY

Public Works Loan Board

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to the quotas for lending to local authorities by the Public Works Loan Board. [77074]

Mr. Milburn: The Public Works Loan Commissioners have issued a circular today notifying local authorities that there will be no change in the formula for calculating quotas for 1999–2000.

A copy of the circular has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the percentage was of all live births with birth weight (a) under 2,500 grammes and (b) under 3,000 grammes in (i) England, (ii) Scotland, (iii) Wales, (iv) Northern Ireland and (v) the United Kingdom in each of the past five years. [75866]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 10 March 1999]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Fox to Mr. Frank Field, dated 12 March 1999:

Cancer Patients

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the five year survival rate for each main group of cancer patients in (a) England, (b) each region of England and (c) each health authority area for the most recent available period, distinguishing between men and women. [76111]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Fox to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 12 March 1999:

In the absence of the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the five year survival rate for each main group of cancer patients.

The five-year relative survival rates for each main group of cancer patients diagnosed in England were published in the volume, Survival of cancer patients in Europe—the EUROCARE study (IARC Scientific Publications no.132). Survival rates in England and Wales were most recently published in ONS Monitor MBI 98/1. Copies of both publications are available in the House of Commons Library.

Survival rates for England and the regions of England form part of the analysis presented within the report, Cancer survival trends, 1971–1995: NHS Region and Deprivation, to be published shortly by The Stationery Office. Survival rates by health authority are not the responsibility of the ONS, but have been published by a number of regional cancer registries within their annual reports.

Productivity Levels

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what research his Department has conducted on ways of calculating productivity levels in terms of resource use as well as in terms of labour; what conclusions he has reached; and if he will make a statement. [75249]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Andrew Stunell, dated 12 March 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the research that has been conducted into how to calculate productivity levels.

International productivity comparisons using output per worker convey useful information, but there is scope to improve the measure of productivity. Therefore the ONS Departmental Spending Review has recently allocated funding to create a new unit, which will take forward research into developing the current range of statistics available. As well as improvements to the existing estimates of output per filled job, the ONS is planning to produce a productivity series based on hours worked. The development of indices of service sector output, now being studied, would also facilitate the generation of productivity measures for the service sector. This extensive work programme reflects users' demand.

Productivity measures in terms of resource used raise considerable difficulties. These relate, amongst other things, to measurement of capital and the problems of weighting capital and labour. There are at present no plans to produce such a measure.

The ONS will keep users informed of any developments through the publication of articles in, for example, Economic Trends.

Housing Benefit

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much money was spent on housing benefit in (a) 1980, (b) 1985, (c) 1990, (d) 1996, (e) 1997 and (f) 1998, in (i) Bolton, (ii) the North West and (iii) England. [75620]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Child Benefit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reasons there is a presumption in benefit regulations that child benefit will normally be paid to a mother. [76296]

Angela Eagle: Child Benefit can be paid to anyone responsible for a child, either because the child lives with them or because they contribute towards the child's maintenance at not less than the weekly rate of Child Benefit. Where two people claim for the same child, priority rules apply as set out in Schedule 10 of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992.

Briefly, a person with whom a child actually lives has priority over a person who contributes to the child's maintenance; where couples live at the same address a wife has priority over a husband, a mother has priority over a father, and a parent has priority over a non-parent. In other circumstances the two persons can jointly elect which of them shall claim, and in default of such election the Secretary of State may decide.

Tribunal Hearings

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the categories of appeals heard by the Independent Tribunal Service at its Glasgow office in the last year for which figures are available with in each case a breakdown of length of waiting time and numbers awaiting a tribunal hearing; and if he will make a statement. [75129]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is in the table. The Independent Tribunal Service (ITS) has embarked on a major programme to reduce the number of cases awaiting appeal hearings and the length of time appellants have to wait. Additional resources have been dedicated to the programme. The number of appeals sessions will have progressively been increased by some 40 per cent. (from 800 to 1,300 a month) by the end of this year and additional venues will have been secured. All cases are being systematically addressed to ensure that all necessary action is being expedited. The organisations who support and represent appellants are actively engaged in discussions about how individual cases can be resolved timeously with fewer postponements or adjournments. This programme is already beginning to have effect.

We are currently overhauling the whole decision making and appeals system. We are firmly committed to tackling the unacceptable delays in the appeals service—currently averaging 7 months across the country, with some appellants waiting over a year for the decision on their case. Regulations that will simplify and speed the appeals process will be debated shortly under affirmative procedures. Under the provisions of the Social Security Act 1998, which paves the way for modernising the delivery of Social Security, one of the major areas of change will be to reduce substantially the current waiting times for appeals.

National Insurance Numbers

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the NIRS2 facilities for issuing national insurance numbers for (a) adults and (b) juveniles will be implemented nationally. [76410]

Mr. Timms: The current waiting time between application and issue of the National Insurance number for new adult registrations is 17 days.

Where Juveniles contact the National Insurance number Helpline and request confirmation of their NI number, a letter is issued within two days.

National Insurance (Non-Domestic Residents)

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people living abroad continue to pay voluntary national insurance contributions; and how many people not resident in the UK have built up sufficient national insurance contributions to entitle them to (a) jobseeker's allowance, (b) incapacity benefit, (c) the state pension, (d) widows' benefits and (e) maternity allowance. Mr. Timms: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out here.

There are 30,000 requests to pay voluntary National Insurance Contributions (NICs) on an annual basis; 15,000 requests to pay voluntary NICs by Direct Debit (per annum); 7,000 requests to pay voluntary NICs by Employers (on their employees' behalf) and 13,000 customers who contact us (per annum) and request to pay NIC arrears.

Angela Eagle: During 1998, there were no cold weather payments issued for the London Borough of Enfield or the constituency of Enfield, North.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Communities Budget

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library documentation supplied by successful applicants to budget line A-3021 in their application, in as far as it relates to how the organisation demonstrates that it works towards European integration. [75085]

Ms Quin: The Report on Beneficiaries of Community Grants 1997 was placed in the Library last year. The 1998 Report will be placed in the Library when it is published.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role his Department has in the selection of awards under Article A-3021 of the General Budget of the European Union, Grants to Organisations Which Actively Promote European Integration; what is his Department's policy as regards future funding of organisations under that Article; and what reports his Department receives of the activities of organisations so funded. [75084]

Ms Quin: The selection of awards under Article A-3021 of the General Budget of the European Union is a matter for the European Union Commission in Brussels; and all activities funded under this budget line are monitored in the first instance by the Commission. Reports on activities funded under this article are available through the Commission.

India (Nuclear Energy)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Indian Government regarding collaboration on civilian nuclear energy; and if he will make a statement. [75937]

Mr. Fatchett: No representations on this subject have been received from the Indian Government.

Mr. Öcalan

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Turkey regarding (a) the treatment in detention of and (b) a fair trial for the Kurdish leader Mr. Öcalan; and if he will make a statement. [76128]

Ms Quin: We have made clear to the Turkish authorities the importance we attach to the trial of Mr. Öcalan being conducted in strict accordance with the rule of law and due process. We have asked that members of the British Embassy be allowed to attend the trial. We remain opposed to the use of the death penalty under any circumstances.

We welcome the public assurances by the Turkish authorities that Mr. Öcalan will receive a fair trial, and that he will be well treated in detention.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what data he has collated on other countries' computer millennium compliance readiness; and if he will make a statement. [76061]

Mr. Fatchett: We have long recognised the potential problems that could be caused internationally by the millennium bug. The UK is working hard to raise global awareness. Reliable information is difficult to obtain. However, we are working closely with other countries and international organisations to build up a picture of the state of readiness around the world in order to minimise potential disruption caused by millennium bug failures and to address potential consequences for British interests.

Consular Fees

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to change any of the consular fees. [76948]

Mr. Fatchett: It costs more to issue a passport overseas than it does in the UK because the volume at each issuing post is small. Until now the additional cost of issuing passports overseas has been met out of fees charged for passports issued in the UK. In future, the costs of issuing passports overseas will be met in full from the fee charged to the applicant. The fee for issuing a passport in the United Kingdom remains unchanged.

The new charges, which will take effect from 12 April 1999, are:

Standard (32 page) passport	43
Frequent Traveller (48 page)	50
Child passport (5 years validity)	25
Emergency passport	20
Amendments to an existing passport	30

Exports

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the Government's arrangements for the support and promotion of exports. [77075]

Mr. Robin Cook: I am delighted to do so, also on behalf of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

This Government attach great importance to the promotion of exports. That is why in June last year the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I asked the Secretary of the Cabinet, Sir Richard Wilson, to review the current arrangements for the support and promotion of exports. I am pleased to be able to announce today the outcome of that Review. Copies of Sir Richard's report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses, and will be widely distributed. It is also available on request to members of the public, and the executive summary can be found on the FCO and DTI websites.

The report records the excellent service given by personnel working on export promotion activity throughout the United Kingdom and in FCO posts around the world, while at the same time identifying a number of areas in the current arrangements which leave scope for improvement.

My right hon. Friend and I welcome the recommendations, the core of which is that all trade promotion and development activities of the DTI and FCO should be unified in a new joint operation led by a single Chief Executive. The Government will expedite the establishment of such a unified operation, equipped with resources, both personnel and finance, broadly along the lines recommended in the Review. It will be known as "British Trade International". This will be a radical change. The new operation, which will have lead responsibility within Government for trade promotion and development, will provide a coherent framework for the Government's work in this area. We are confident that it will deliver an even better service to business.

The operation's first Chief Executive, who will have Permanent Secretary rank, will be Sir David Wright, currently Ambassador in Tokyo. We are confident that, with his experience of export promotion at home and abroad, he is ideally equipped for the task. He will be responsible, in consultation with DTI and FCO and others concerned, for the design of the new operation's precise configuration and the implementation of Sir Richard's other recommendations. Sir David will of course have flexibility over the details of the implementation, and he will have effective control over the operation's resources and personnel. And he will be responsible to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and myself, through a ministerially chaired board, for the performance of the entire operation from local to international level. This will be measured against a national export development strategy and objectives which the board will set.

The new board will be chaired by DTI and FCO Ministers and will subsume the present British Overseas Trade Board. It will be drawn predominantly from the private sector. In addition to senior officials from the FCO, DTI and the Exports Credits Guarantee Department, it will also contain representatives of the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland administrations to guarantee their direct involvement in shaping the national strategy.

The current arrangements for the delivery of export promotion services in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland will continue within the context of national policy. The Scottish, Welsh and Northern Irish administrations would continue to have discretion to provide supplementary programmes to meet the particular needs of businesses in those parts of the United Kingdom.

Overseas delivery of the services of the new operation will continue through our diplomatic posts overseas. Heads of Mission will be responsible to the Chief Executive for the performance of their posts in support of British business abroad against the strategy and objectives of the new operation.

In England, the new operation will place greater emphasis on effective delivery of export services in the regions. The regional and local network, at present in Government Regional Offices and Business Links, will be integral to the new unified operation, under the effective control of the Chief Executive. In implementing the recommendations, the Chief Executive will need to work closely with the new Small Business Service which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced earlier this week on 10 March 1999, Official Report, columns 367–79, and the Regional Development Agencies in each region.

British Trade International will seek to provide a fast, consistent and high quality response to its customers in the business community. It will be staffed by personnel from both the FCO and DTI, and may also recruit directly, including through secondments. It will be supported by modern IT and other facilities designed to provide integrated information and communication systems.

The Chief Executive and the board will review the balance between the present range of export services and the provision of help to firms to develop their export capability, and also the scope for devolution of responsibility to the regional and international networks.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I are confident that the new unified operation will represent a significant advance over present arrangements, both in terms of strategic direction and of improved customer focus, producing a real improvement in service delivery to business. It will be a major change and will take time to achieve. That will be primarily the task for the new Chief Executive. Meanwhile, I can assure the House that there will be no hiatus: the present services to exporters will remain fully operational and available throughout the transition period.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will deposit in the Library the answers to Parliamentary Questions 59798, 19 November 1998, Official Report, column 808, on Our Europe Association; 59795, 19 November 1998, Official Report, column 808, on the London Conference (European Association); 59805, 19 November 1998, Official Report, column 808, on the European Adventure Project; and 59796, 19 November 1998, Official Report, column 808, on the Business Euro Label. [71146]

Ms Quin: The answers to Parliamentary Questions 59795 and 59798 have been deposited in the Library of the House. A letter has been sent to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) requesting clarification on the Business Euro Label and the European Adventure Project. When this information has been received and a reply issued, copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Genetic Modification

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) on how many occasions (a) Ministers and (b) officials in his Department have (i) spoken with and (ii) received representations regarding genetic modification from Mr. Stan Greenberg of Greenberg Research; [72245]

(2) on how many occasions (a) Ministers and (b) officials in his Department have (i) spoken with and (ii) received representations regarding genetic modification from Dave Hill of Bell Pottinger; [72065]

(3) on how many occasions (a) Ministers and (b) officials in his Department have (i) spoken with and (ii) received representations regarding genetic modification from Cathy McGlynn of Bell Pottinger. [72062]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 23 February 1999]: I and my officials are in regular contact with representatives of all those with an interest in biotechnology—including environmental groups, consumer groups and biotechnology companies. It is not the normal practice of governments to give details of specific meetings with private individuals or companies.

Task Forces

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a list of (1) task forces and (2) policy reviews established by his Department since May 1997 which (a) had external members recruited by way of public advertisement, and details of any person so appointed and (b) engaged in public consultation exercises, and the form that these took. [74464]

Mr. Byers: None of the external members of task forces and review bodies established by my Department since 1 May 1997 were recruited by way of public advertisement. Most task forces and reviews are short-term bodies established to give thorough consideration to particular issues. External members are invited to sit on some reviews and task forces because they are able to contribute specific experience and expertise. In such cases, public advertising would be inappropriate and disproportionate. Since 1 October 1998, appointments to those task forces which qualify for classification as advisory non-departmental public bodies have come within the remit of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

Details of public consultation carried out by task forces and reviews established since 1 May 1997 are set out in the table.

Review/task force	Public consultation
Review of Utilities Regulation	Published the Green Paper A Fair Deal for Consumers: Modernising the Framework of Utility Regulation (March 1998) and two further consultation documents: A Fair Deal for Consumers: Modernising the Framework of Utility Regulation—Public Consultation Paper on Consumer Councils (September 1998) and A Fair Deal for Consumers: Modernising the Framework of Utility Regulation—Public Consultation Paper on the future of gas and electricity regulation (October 1998)
Review of energy sources for power regeneration	The terms of reference for the Review were announced on 22 December 1997, and a general invitation was made for interested parties to submit representations. Proposals for reform were issued for consultation on 25 June 1998. The consultation document was sent to all those who had replied to the first invitation to make representations, to those with outstanding power station consent applications, and to any other organisation or person that requested a copy. It was also published on the Internet.
Review of the Post Office	Following announcement of the review in May 1997 discussions were held with Post Office senior management, the Post Office unions, the Post Office Users' National Council and other interested parties. A summary of the main points arising from these consultations were included in the Government's response to the Trade and Industry Select Committee's Report on the Post Office (response published in April 1998), since which time there has been further consultations with these parties as part of the next stage of the review.
Review of the Technical Help for Exporters Scheme	Views were sought from interested parties by means of a questionnaire issued in November and December 1997.
Review of Company Law	Published two consultation documents; Modern Company Law for a Competitive Economy (March 1998) and Modern Company Law: The Strategic Framework (February 1999).
Review of Assisted Areas	Published consultation document: Review of Assisted Areas Map (July 1998).
Oil and Gas Industry Task Force	Letters were sent to industry stakeholders and a dedicated website set up specifically inviting contributions.
Review of the framework for overseeing developments in biotechnology (joint Office of Science and Technology/Cabinet Office review)	Consultation paper issued following announcement of the review on 17 December 1998.
Review of new and renewable energy	A consultation document is expected to be published shortly.

Review/task force	Public consultation
Review of electricity trading arrangements	OFFER issued an initial consultation paper in November 1997 inviting views, which were taken into account when drawing up the proposed terms of reference. These terms of reference were in turn published for consultation in January 1998. Working papers were published and discussed at a two-day seminar in April 1998. OFFER published the interim conclusions in June 1998 which were discussed at a further seminar and on which written comments were also invited. The final conclusions were published in July 1998.

Industrial and Provident Societies

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if industrial and provident societies will be included in the current review of insolvency being carried out by his Department; and if he will make a statement. [74175]

Dr. Howells: The terms of reference of the joint DTI/Treasury review are to review aspects of company and insolvency law and practice in the UK and elsewhere relating to opportunities for, and means by which, businesses can resolve short to medium term financial difficulties, so as to preserve maximum economic value; and to make recommendations. The terms of reference would enable consideration to be given to the position of industrial and provident societies.

Car Prices

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the recent European Commission report on the cost of British cars for sale in the UK compared with their cost in other EU countries. [74033]

Dr. Howells: The European Commission's latest report on car prices in the European Union showed that price differences had significantly decreased since its previous report but that the UK continued to be the most expensive market for many models.

We shall be encouraging the Commission, as part of its evaluation of the cars block exemption, to identify the reasons for these price differences.

Biotechnological Companies

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many unminuted pre-arranged meetings occurred between (a) himself, (b) Ministers in his Department and (c) his officials and representatives of the biotechnological industry sector since 1 May 1998. [74838]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 5 March 1999]: I and my officials are in regular contact with representatives of all those with an interest in biotechnology—including environmental groups, consumer groups and biotechnology companies. It is not normal practice of governments to give details of specific meetings with private individuals or companies.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the biotechnological companies which have placed staff (a) on secondment and (b) on placement within his Department since 1 May 1997. [74839]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs to the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) on 11 February 1999, Official Report, columns 405–10. This refers to the list of companies which currently have staff on secondment in my department and the DTI directorate in which they have been placed. In addition, I attach a further list of those companies which have had staff on secondment to the department on or after 1 May 1997, which are no longer on the current list.

Biological Materials (Patents)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his Department's policy in respect of the forthcoming review of TRIPS clauses on the protection of biological resources. [74848]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The current exclusions from patentability for biological materials as set out in Article 27.3(b) of the World Trade Organisation (WTO) Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) Agreement allow all WTO members sufficient flexibility to implement patent regimes appropriate to their individual circumstances, within internationally agreed boundaries. This provision allows national intellectual property regimes to focus clearly on technical contributions whether they be by genetic modification or traditional plant breeding techniques.

Departmental Meeting

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his letter of 26 January to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, if he will make a statement on the outcome of the meeting between the Department of Health, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Association of British Pharmaceutical Industries to refine and prioritise an agreed action list. [73411]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 9 March 1999]: The meeting has not yet taken place and is currently being arranged. I will let my hon. Friend know the outcome in due course.

Genetically Modified Products

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the safety of cosmetics containing genetically modified products into which antibiotic resistance gene markers have been inserted when used by people undergoing antibiotic treatment for skin conditions. [76056]

Dr. Howells: Under the Cosmetic Products (Safety) Regulations 1996, cosmetic products must be assessed by their manufacturers for safety to ensure that they are not harmful to human health.

My Department has made no assessment of the safety of cosmetics containing ingredients which may be derived from a genetically modified source, but we will be supporting the moves proposed by the European Commission Scientific Steering Committee to develop harmonised guidelines for Genetically Modified Organism (GMO) risk assessments for cosmetic products.

Export Licences

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answers of 1 February 1999, Official Report, columns 505–06, what assessment he made of the compliance of the licences for the export of military vehicles and electronic equipment specially designed and modified for military use to Rwanda with the terms of UN Resolution 1011 (1995). [75811]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 10 March 1999]: Of the five licences detailed in my answer of 1 February 1999, Official Report, columns 505–06, four covered exports to the Rwandan Government, and details of the other licence were set out in the answer given to the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, on 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 849–50.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answers of 1 February 1999, Official Report, columns 505–06, what steps he took to ensure that the equipment licensed for export to Angola was supplied in accordance with the embargo imposed by UN Resolution 864 (1993). [75810]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 10 March 1999]: I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible and place a copy of that letter in the Library of the House.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answers of 1 February 1999, Official Report, columns 505–06, what steps he took to ensure that the licences for the export of goods to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia did not breach the embargo on the export of arms to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. [75812]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 10 March 1999]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 21 May 1998, Official Report, column 532.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 1 February 1999, Official Report, columns 505–06, what steps he took to ensure that the licences for the export of goods to Afghanistan did not conflict with the EU Council Common Position 96/746/CFSP imposing an embargo on the export of arms, munitions and military equipment to Afghanistan. [75813]

Dr. Howells: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 26 November 1998, Official Report, column 11.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on British Nuclear Fuel's plans to dispose of nuclear waste in Australia. [75941]

Mr. Battle: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale), to the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) on 30 November 1998, Official Report, column 48.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the stockpile of nuclear waste at Sellafield contains material of high enough quality to make a nuclear weapon; and if he will make a statement. [76015]

Mr. Battle: The material contained within nuclear waste currently stored at Sellafield is not of suitable quality to make a nuclear weapon.

London Fashion Week

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the risk to the future of London Fashion Week from fashion houses displaying in New York instead. [76158]

Mr. Battle: The success of London Fashion Week in February illustrated that the show is now firmly established as a leading fashion event alongside Milan, Paris and New York. Over 44 designers showed collections, over 140 companies participated in the exhibition and many others remain keen to take part.

There are many and varied reasons why designers decide to show in other cities either instead of, or in addition to London. These are often linked to business expansion and a wish to attach specific overseas opportunities. I expect the new design talent to participate in London Fashion Week, maintaining the Show's position as the leading international showcase for innovative, cutting edge fashion design talent.

Science Policy Initiatives

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contributions he expects to be made to the Government's science policy initiatives by (a) the Wellcome Trust and (b) the Gatsby Foundation. [76072]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 11 March 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Ms Moran) on 10 March 1999, Official Report, columns 261–62. The Wellcome Trust is contributing some £18 million and the Gatsby Charitable Foundation £2 million towards the University Challenge Fund. Both organisations have contributed to the arrangements for the Challenge and to the assessment of the entries.

In addition, the Wellcome Trust is contributing £300 million towards the Joint Infrastructure Fund and some £110 million towards the cost of a new synchrotron.

Technology-related Developments

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list successful clusters of technology-related developments of the kind described in the Competitiveness White Paper. [76075]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The Competitiveness White Paper said that clusters were a strong source of business development for all types of business, not just technology-related ones. It would not be possible to list all the clusters in the UK, but examples include TV and film post-production in Central London, broadcast technology in Surrey, Hampshire and Berkshire, chemicals in Teesside, electronics in and around Cambridge, biotechnology clusters also in and around Cambridge and in Oxfordshire, Guildford and Central Scotland.

Non-fossil Fuel Energy (North-West)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage non-fossil fuel energy production in the North-West of England. [76357]

Mr. Battle: The Government have a Manifesto commitment to "a new and strong drive to develop renewable sources of energy".

As part of that commitment, the Government will be issuing a consultation document shortly on the status and prospects for renewable energy in the UK as a whole and inviting views to help the Government frame future policy.

Under the fifth Non-Fossil Fuel Order (NFFO)—the largest round so far—which I announced last autumn, we have awarded 31 contracts for projects to be sited in the North-West of England. These contracts for landfill gas and small and large scale wind projects would provide additional generating capacity of 70MW DNC if they were all implemented.

Textile Industry

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from the textile trade (a) owners and (b) trade unions concerning problems facing the industry; and if he will make a statement. [76263]

Mr. Battle: My Department has received a number of representations from owners and trade unions involved in the textiles industry. The most significant of these was the presentation of a joint Action Plan to improve the competitiveness of the textiles and clothing sector submitted by the British Apparel and Textile Confederation and the industry's principal trade unions. The industry has now established the Textiles and Clothing Strategy Group, made up of representatives from trade associations, trade unions, academia, manufacturing and Government, to develop a strategy for the long term sustainable development of the industry, building on the work in the Action Plan. My Department provides the secretariat for the group.

HEALTH

Genzyme Corporation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the licence applications received since 1 May 1997 from the Genzyme Corporation, indicating which (a) involve the injection of cells from pigs into human brains and (b) have been submitted for consideration to UKXIRA. [72571]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 22 February 1999]: Applications to the United Kingdom Xenotransplantation Interim Regulatory Authority (UKXIRA) must be submitted in accordance with the requirements set out in "Guidance on making proposals to conduct xenotransplantation on human subjects". Copies of the guidance is available through the Department of Health, PO Box 410, Wetherby, LS23 7LL. The UKXIRA Website (address www.doh.gov.uk/ukxira.htm) also gives details of both of the guidance and the work of the authority.

Information contained in applications is submitted in confidence. The number of applications received has not changed since the answer given on 4 February 1999, Official Report, column 776.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 22 February 1999, Official Report, columns 138–39, on waiting times, how many patients in the Mid Essex Hospital Trust area had been waiting (a) 13 to 25 weeks and (b) more than 26 weeks to see a consultant at the end of December 1998. [73154]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 February 1999]: The number of people waiting 13 to 25 weeks to see a consultant was 1,848 at the end of December 1998; the number of people waiting over 26 weeks was 440 at the end of December 1998.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to ensure that the North Essex Health Authority publishes figures on waiting lists on the same basis as his Department. [73120]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 February 1999]: We are content that the waiting list figures North Essex Health Authority publishes are consistent with those collected by the Department and published by the Government Statistical Service.

However, we have asked the North Essex Health Authority to ensure that, when publishing waiting list figures for local trusts, it is made clear that the figures relate only to the health authority's own residents.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will investigate discrepancies between the figures published by the North Essex Health Authority on the total number of people waiting for hospital treatment in the Mid Essex Hospital Trust Area and the figures published by his Department. [73119]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 February 1999]: We have compared figures published recently by the North Essex Health Authority with those collected by the Department and published by the Government Statistical Service and identified no discrepancies. However, whereas the Government Statistical Service publishes the health authority total, North Essex Health Authority also publishes the number of its residents waiting at each local National Health Service trust.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that health authorities publish hospital waiting list figures that are compatible with the figures published by his Department. [73118]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 February 1999]: National Health Service waiting list figures are collected from health authorities and NHS trusts by the Department and published by the Government Statistical Service. The data are subject to validation and any anomalies are investigated with the health authority or NHS trust concerned. We are not aware of health authorities publishing hospital waiting list figures differing from these figures.

Dental Services

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will commission a cost/benefit analysis of a preventive approach to dentistry. [74299]

Mr. Denham: The most effective oral health promotion measure is the fluoridation of water. A review of the economic benefits of fluoridation by the Health Economics Consortium of the University of York was published last year. Copies are available in the Library.

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that (a) primary health care groups and (b) future primary care trusts make appropriate provision for dentistry and oral health. [75677]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 10 March 1999]: Health Improvement Programmes will ensure that all stakeholders are actively engaged in developing plans that will address all of the health and health care needs of local communities. All health improvement programmes must include oral health. In addition, we are already taking steps to improve the quality of dental services and ensure easier access, through the Personal Dental Services Pilots which began in October 1998 and through the Investing In Dentistry scheme, which is improving access to the General Dental Services.

Nursing and Care Homes

Mr. Dorrell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state for the latest available year and the two preceding years the (a) number of residents of registered nursing homes, (b) number of residents of registered care homes, (c) average weekly cost of a place in a registered nursing home, (d) average weekly cost of a place in a registered care home, (e) proportion of residents of nursing homes who receive assistance with the cost of their care from public funds, and the total cost of that assistance and (f) proportion of residents of care homes who receive assistance with the cost of their care from public funds and the total cost of that assistance. [74949]

Mr. Hutton: The table contains figures on the number of residents in nursing and residential care homes for the last year available (1997) and the two preceding years together with information on the average weekly cost of a placement. We do not have data on the proportion of residents supported from public funds but the table contains data on numbers of supported residents and total expenditure on residential and nursing home care by social services and the number of people receiving help with the cost of their care through Income Support.

Notes:
All expenditure figures are as at 31 March for each year.
Due to poor response from care homes, the residential figures for 1997 have been estimated and are not as reliable as previous years data.
The significant reduction in elderly residents between 1996 and 1997 can be attributed to better assignment of these residents to other client groups such as EMI, Learning Disabilities and Others.
Average weekly cost figures for residential/nursing homes are from Lang and Buisson Income Support expenditure is based on a 5 per cent. sample of all cases and as such is subject to a degree of sampling error.

Non-state-registered Doctors

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to regulate the activities of non-state-registered doctors. [75223]

Mr. Denham: The General Medical Council is responsible for registering and regulating all doctors practising medicine within the United Kingdom, whether the doctors are working in the National Health Service or privately.

NHS Patients (Private Sector Hospitals)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS patients were admitted to private sector hospitals during the winter months. [75456]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Meningitis

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to implement a programme to vaccinate all high-risk groups of the population against meningitis; and how many cases of meningitis there have been in each year since 1990. [75457]

Ms Jowell: Present advice from the Public Health Laboratory Service Meningococcus Working Group, endorsed by the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation, recommends using the existing meningococcal vaccine under specific conditions for groups at high risk. There are no plans at present to widen these recommendations. Research is being actively promoted into meningococcal vaccines that may overcome some of the shortcomings of the existing vaccine and may, therefore, be suitable for more widespread use. Notifications of meningococcal disease are given in the table.

Meningococcal infection occurs throughout the year, but infections reach a peak in the winter months and the number of cases so far this year is in line with recent winters. There are irregular upsurges in meningococcal infection and recent years have seen an increase in the incidence of disease.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will introduce a right of appeal against decisions of the Medicines Control Agency; [75730]

(2) what changes or amendments he proposes to the Medicines Marketing Authorisation Regulations 1994; and when. [75729]

Ms Jowell: We have recently consulted on proposals to amend the regulations to improve procedures for classifying "borderline products" as medicines or otherwise. We are considering the results of the consultation and will make an announcement shortly. As part of our consideration, we are examining whether we can introduce a system whereby licensing authority decisions can be made subject to appropriate review mechanisms.

Contaminated Blood Products (Compensation)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the basis of the compensation entitlement for those suffering from (a) the AIDS virus and (b) hepatitis C through contaminated blood products. [75559]

Mr. Hutton: As a general rule, compensation or other financial assistance is paid only when the NHS, or individuals working in it, has been at fault. This is not the case with infection by HIV or hepatitis C through blood products before viral screening tests and inactivation processes were available. An exception to this general rule was the special payment scheme for people infected with HIV through NHS treatment with blood or blood products. This reflected the widespread public fear of the disease at the time, when the infection was rapidly fatal and associated with sexual transmission.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in the United Kingdom are currently suffering from hepatitis C; and how many of these have contracted their condition as a consequence of receiving contaminated blood products in the course of NHS treatment. [75560]

Mr. Hutton: The exact number of people with hepatitis C in the United Kingdom is not known. Estimates suggest that around 250,000 to 300,000 may carry the virus. We estimate that 4,000 were infected with hepatitis C through their National Health Service treatment with blood products, mainly for haemophilia, before the introduction of viral inactivation processes in 1985.

Pregnancy Quitline

Ms Ryan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many calls the Pregnancy Quitline has received since it was established. [75836]

Ms Jowell: In its first 14 months the Pregnancy Quitline service, which is based in Doncaster, has recorded a total of 6,791 calls.

Mobile Phones

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in his Department's discussions with mobile phone companies on possible research into possible health risks. [76361]

Ms Jowell: A meeting has been arranged for Departmental officials to meet mobile phone companies to discuss areas of common interest.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what results have been published from research supported by his Department into the health dangers of mobile phones. [76378]

Ms Jowell: The Department has funded research projects on possible health effects of radiofrequency fields which have not yet been published. The Department is also supporting the World Health Organisation (WHO) International Electromagnetic Fields Project which is reviewing electromagnetic field health effects in general. The WHO has placed its interim findings on its Web site.

Buckinghamshire Health Authority

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the post of Chairman of the Buckinghamshire Health Authority became vacant; when the post was advertised; and when he expects to appoint someone to the position. [75947]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The previous chairman of Buckinghamshire Health Authority submitted his resignation on 1 July 1998, giving three months notice. The post was subsequently advertised in the local press on 10 and 11 September. A decision will be announced shortly.

Mixed-sexed Wards

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards eliminating mixed-sexed wards. [76037]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The National Health Service Executive is continuing to monitor progress towards achieving this policy objective. A monitoring exercise to establish the latest position throughout the NHS was carried out recently, and we shall publish the results of this exercise shortly.

Last week we unveiled details of a £1.1 billion capital investment to be made in the next financial year in new NHS buildings and equipment. This investment will further work towards the elimination of mixed-sex accommodation.

Cancer Surgery (Waiting Lists)

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards the Government's target to end waiting for cancer surgery. [76036]

Mr. Hutton: We have a programme of measures in place targeted at cutting waiting times for cancer treatment. Additional resources have already been invested in breast and colorectal cancer services and we have recently announced a further £10 million to improve lung cancer services. This targeted investment has demonstrated tangible improvements in services and has enabled the National Health Service to finance additional work force, training and equipment to speed access to diagnosis, reduce waiting times for treatment and improve quality of care as part of the ongoing implementation of the Calman/Hine recommendations.

The National Health Service has put the necessary systems in place to meet The New NHS guarantee that by April 1999 everyone with suspected breast cancer will be able to see a specialist within two weeks of their general practitioner deciding they need to be seen urgently and requesting an appointment. We are also developing a programme of action which will deliver rapid and sustainable improvements in the speed and quality of care for all patients with a suspected or a diagnosed cancer. We will continue to build on this progress over the course of this Parliament.

General Practitioner Commissioning

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards introducing general practitioner commissioning. [76031]

Mr. Denham: [holding answer 11 March 1999]: From April, primary care groups covering the whole of England will share with Health Authorities the task of commissioning health services. Primary care groups will enable local doctors and nurses, who best understand patients' to work together in partnership to help shape local services.

Earning Profiles

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department is undertaking, or has undertaken, on the lifetime earnings profiles of women. [76097]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The Women's Unit is undertaking, for the first time, a detailed analysis of the distribution of women's incomes over their lifetime. This will examine issues such as the pay gap, occupational segregation and the effects of key events (such as having children) on women's incomes. The project will build on the forthcoming report "Women's Individual Incomes 1966–67" which will be published jointly by the Women's Unit and the Government Statistical Service in the near future.

Suicide

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve training and support for GPs and family doctors to help them recognise the symptoms of potential suicide in young men. [76742]

Mr. Denham: In 1999–2000, £146 million extra funding will be invested in mental health services, of which £12 million will provide support for education and training of doctors and nurses. This will include general practitioners and family doctors. It is not however practicable or desirable for the Government to prescribe the exact training that any individual doctor will receive. The medical education curriculum is a matter for the General Medical Council, medical schools, the relevant Medical Royal Colleges and the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for General Practitioners.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a list of those organisations that have been awarded grant assistance under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 for the coming year. [76087]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Dietary Supplement (Definition)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's definition of a dietary supplement. [75728]

Mr. Rooker: I have been asked to reply.

The term "dietary supplement" is not defined in UK legislation, nor has a definition been adopted for administrative purposes. Depending upon their nature and presentation, products described as dietary supplements may be regarded in law as either foods or medicines and would be subject to the same controls as apply to other foods or medicines.

SCOTLAND

Dr. Arpad Pusztai

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will investigate the circumstances surrounding Dr. Arpad Pusztai's departure from his post at the Rowett Research Institute; and if he will make a statement. [69825]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 8 February 1999]: The departure of Dr. Pusztai was entirely a matter for the Rowett Research Institute as his employers.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what involvement his Office had in discussions leading to the retirement of Dr. Arpad Pusztai from the Rowett Institute. [70048]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 15 February 1999]: The Scottish Office had no involvement in the decision on Dr. Pusztai's retirement. This was entirely a matter for the Rowett Research Institute. The Director of the Rowett Research Institute kept The Scottish Office in touch with the situation.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Winter Deaths

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will break down the excess winter deaths for each of the last three years by socio-economic class, indicating (a) all ages, (b) those aged 60 to 70 years and (c) those aged 70 years and over. [75450]

Mr. McLeish: There is no universally accepted definition of "excess winter deaths". The information presented in the table is based on a formula that has been used in recent years by the Office for National Statistics when presenting data for England and Wales. This defines excess winter deaths as the difference between the number of deaths during the four months December to March and the average number of deaths during the preceding four months (August to November) and the following four months (April to July). As this is a crude measure of the increase in mortality associated with winter conditions the numbers of excess deaths have been rounded to the nearest ten.

The socio-economic breakdown used, social class based on occupation, is derived from information about the deceased's occupation and employment status (or, when appropriate, that of their parents and spouse) as stated at death registration. It is known that such information is incomplete for certain groups, particularly elderly women. As these form a large proportion of "excess" deaths the data need to be interpreted with care.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Medical Students

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the capacity for expansion of existing medical schools to accommodate additional medical places required by the NHS; and if he will make a statement; [75454]

(2) if he will make a statement on the capacity for clinical positions for students at medical schools. [75452]

Mr. Galbraith: Current work force planning for the NHS in Scotland does not require a change in the level of intake for medical schools. There is therefore currently no need to expend the capacity of medical schools in Scotland.

There is sufficient provision for clinical positions for the current level of students at medical schools in Scotland. The NHS in Scotland will be able to meet changes in the demand for clinical positions arising from changes in the curriculum or future changes in the number of students.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Police Funding

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the year-on-year change in central Government funding for police between 1979–80 and 1999–2000 in (a) cash and (b) real terms; and if he will make a statement. [75225]

Mr. McLeish: The Secretary of State pays police specific grant at 51 per cent. of net eligible expenditure by police authorities. Annual changes in police specific grant are determined by changes in the level of Grant Aided Expenditure as set by the Secretary of State and by forces' budgets set by police authorities.

The figures requested are shown in the table. The figure for 1997–98 includes £3.5 million for the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting.

DEFENCE

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if RAF Bentwaters formed part of the sale of his Department's married quarters to Nomura negotiated in 1996–97. [76293]

Mr. Spellar: No.

RAF Brize Norton

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what complaints he has received regarding the Defence Housing Executive's policy of evicting irregular occupants from his Department's houses at RAF Brize Norton; and if he will make a statement. [76298]

Mr. Spellar: None other than that from the hon. Member.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75875]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 10 March 1999]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me or my Ministerial colleagues drafts of Select Committee reports, or parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor to the best of my knowledge have there been any occasions on which members of the Select Committee have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Orders.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Mackerel (South Devon)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what inspections have been carried out in each of the last 20 days within the mackerel conservation box off the coast of South Devon of factory and industrial fishing ships from European countries; when the inspections were made; and what was found there; [75201]

(2) which factory ships have been fishing in the mackerel conservation box off the coast of South Devon in the last 28 days; in which countries such ships are registered; and what steps have been taken to ensure their departure from the conservation box. [75202]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 10 March 1999]: The Ministry has no record of any sightings of factory ships or industrial vessels fishing in the Mackerel Box in the last 28 days and there have been no inspections undertaken on such vessels during the last 20 days.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what records are kept, and by whom, of satellite surveillance of the mackerel conservation box off the coast of South Devon. [75203]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 10 March 1999]: The Ministry has no records of satellite surveillance of fishing vessels in the Mackerel Box.

GM Animal Feed

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the safety of products derived from animals which eat genetically modified animal feed. [75420]

Mr. Rooker: The Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes (ACNFP) considers the implications for human health of the use of genetically modified (GM) materials in animal feed in its role as the UK body which carries out safety assessments under the EC Novel Foods Regulation. The Advisory Committee on Animal Feedingstuffs, which is currently being set up, will be liaising closely with the ACNFP and the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment on this matter.

GM Crops and Foods

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce legislation to make biotechnology companies legally and financially liable for any damage to human health cause by genetically modified crops and foods made from plants manufactured by them. [75199]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 10 March 1999]: There are rigorous procedures in place to assess the risks from foods derived from genetically modified plants before they are allowed into the food chain. This is to ensure that such foods are as safe as their non GM counterparts. On the basis of Common Law principles, a firm holding the marketing consent for a GMO crop can be held liable in law for any damages arising from ill effects attributed to that crop.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the regional spread of bovine tuberculosis. [74687]

Mr. Rooker: Incidence of TB in cattle continues to be concentrated in the traditional TB "hot spot" counties of Cornwall, Devon, Gloucestershire, Hereford and Worcester and parts of Wales, with a number of incidents also recorded in several other counties, particularly Staffordshire and Wiltshire. Summarised in the table are details of the number of incidents of TB in cattle in Great Britain in each county in 1997 and the first six months of 1998. Figures for the whole of 1998 are not yet available.

1. Each new confirmed TB incident relates to a herd which has been TB free, but which during 1997 or January to June 1998 was found to have TB.

2. Although it is acknowledged that many of the counties no longer exist as administrative authorities, data are presented in this form in order to retain continuity for historical comparison.

Agrochemicals

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list the (a) herbicides, (b) fungicides and (c) pesticides which are banned in other EU member states but are approved for use in the United Kingdom, indicating the conditions attached to their use; [75495]

(2) he will list the (a) herbicides, (b) pesticides and (c) fungicides which have restrictions on their use in other (i) European Union and (ii) G7 countries and which are used in the United Kingdom without similar restrictions. [75498]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 10 March 1999]: All 18 countries of the EU and G7 have regulatory systems that only permit pesticides (including herbicides and fungicides) to be used once they have been authorised by government. This means that a common reason why a pesticide is not authorised in one of these countries is that no application for authorisation has been made for commercial reasons. When the use of a pesticide is allowed, specific restrictions on use may be imposed by the government concerned, but these could reflect differences in climate, ecology and application methods available as well as the crop to be protected and the pest to be targeted.

While the EU produces lists of active substances of agricultural pesticides authorised for use in each Member State, there are no systematic arrangements for Member States to pool information about the decisions they make or the reasons for them. Similarly, the G7 countries do not exchange information about restrictions on the use of authorised agricultural pesticides. The information requested therefore cannot be provided.

In the UK, all herbicides, fungicides and other pesticides are strictly controlled. The government keep pesticides under review and do not hesitate to ban or restrict products if this is warranted. We also require companies to submit any potentially adverse information which comes to their attention, including studies generated at the request of another country's authorities.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list (a) herbicides, (b) pesticides and (c) fungicides on the Red List which have been approved for use in agriculture and horticulture, indicating the conditions attached to their use. [75415]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 10 March 1999]: Eight of the twenty three substances on the Red List are contained in pesticides approved for use in agriculture and horticulture. Atrazine, simazine and trifluralin are approved as herbicides, and gamma-hexachlorocyclohexane (lindane), dichlorvos, fenitrothion, malathion and endosulfan are approved as insecticides. In considering the approval or review of a pesticide, an assessment is made of the risk to the aquatic environment. Only if this assessment shows that there is no unacceptable risk will approval be granted or allowed to continue.

All pesticides are subject to strict statutory control. General conditions relating to use are imposed by Schedules 3 and 4 to the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986 (as amended by the Control of Pesticides (Amendment) Regulations 1997). There are 166 products approved containing these eight pesticides and I shall write to my hon. Friend to set out the specific conditions attached to the use of these particular products.

Genetically Modified Material

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 27 January 1999, Official Report, column 302, what recent legal advice he has (a) sought and (b) received in respect of whether World Trade Organisation rules permit genetically modified material used in food production to be segregated as a condition of import. [75188]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 March 1999]: It is made clear under the World Trade Organisation Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures, that World Trade Organisation members have the right to take measures necessary for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health, but these must be based on scientific principles and not maintained without sufficient scientific evidence. A requirement to segregate GM products at import other than on this basis would therefore be a trade-restrictive measure.

Milk Imports

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much milk was imported each year from 1990 to the latest year for which figures are available. [75842]

Mr. Rooker: Total UK imports of milk since 1990 are as shown.

Novel Foods

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each of the requests submitted to him and to other Member States in connection with the placing on the market of genetically modified novel foods or novel food ingredients, pursuant to Article 4 of Regulation (EC) No. 258/97, (a) the competent food assessment body which prepared each initial assessment under that Article, (b) the dates of each such assessment and (c) details of deliberate release consents and of decisions authorising the placing on the market under Part C of Directive 90/220/EEC accompanying the submission or to which the submission relates. [69876]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 8 February 1999]: The following competent authorities have provided initial assessments for applications under the EC Novel Foods Regulation (258/97) on the dates given:

Advisory Committee for Novel Foods and Processes (UK): tomatoes (8 June 1998).

The Provisional Committee for the Safety Evaluation of Novel Foods (Netherlands):

radicchio rosso (27 October 1998), chicory (27 October 1998), maize and high oleic soya (still under consideration).

Copies of documents relating to these assessments have been placed in the Library of the House. Details of deliberate release consents under Directive 90/220 can be found on the following EC website addresses:

Shellfish

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, following his Department's consultation exercise on shellfish conservation, he will make a statement on improved protection of UK shellfish stocks. [76947]

Mr. Morley: The responses to our consultation last Summer on improved conservation measures for shellfish proposed by the Fisheries Conservation Group were generally very positive.

In the light of this clear endorsement, the Government have decided that legislation should be laid, to increase from 1 January 2000, the minimum landing sizes of lobster, edible crab, and male spider crab landed into the UK from British registered fishing vessels.

From the same day, the landing of any lobster or crawfish which has been V-notched would also be prohibited. In Northern Ireland, the current Great Britain landing size of 65mm carapace width for velvet crab will be introduced there at the same time.

The landing size for whelks will be 45mm. This recognises concerns expressed in the consultation exercise that, in some parts of the country, 45mm was the largest size of whelk found and larger size was impracticable.

These moves are aimed at conserving shellfish stocks and clearly illustrate our commitment to work with the industry.

Full details are in the table:

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Employment Service

Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what amount of money has been set aside within the Employment Service budget in the current year to provide for child care for Employment Service staff; [75897]

(2) if he will make a statement about the effects of the family-friendly policies within the Employment Service listed by his Department in a booklet published in February (a) nationally, (b) regionally and (c) in east London; [75899]

(3) how many members of Employment Service staff are currently on term-time working initiatives; [75898]

(4) how many play schemes have been set up for Employment Service staff in the last 12 months. [75896]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Jim Fitzpatrick, dated 12 March 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions concerning the Employment Service's position on Family Friendly and Childcare Policies. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

I wrote to all staff in the Employment Service in January of this year restating the Employment Service Board's commitment to equality of opportunity. This week, we have also issued a document entitled "Childcare Provision and Family Friendly Policy. A Statement to Staff in DfEE and ES from the Secretary of State, the DfEE Board and the ES Chief Executive", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

The Employment Service has a wide range of policies available, all of which apply nationally, to support staff with family commitments and our intention is that these should be used to the full. The majority of Employment Service staff already work flexible hours, and 21% work part time. Of these, we estimate that around 40 work formal term time hours. Significantly more take advantage of our special leave arrangements to cover school holiday periods.

With regard to playschemes, in 1998 the Employment Service had 650 playscheme places in 22 locations. No new playschemes were opened in the last twelve months, but our intention is to encourage such schemes wherever they are viable and cost effective. We are also working closely with the Benefits Agency to establish where we can make joint provision available.

The Employment Service does not have a separate national budget for childcare. Overall budgets are allocated to our Regional Directors, and to the ES Directors for Scotland and Wales, who have authority individually to assess and where appropriate fund childcare facilities in individual locations.

I hope this is helpful.

Childcare Provision and Family Friendly Policy

Statement to Staff in DfEE and ES

From the Secretary of State, the DfEE Board and the ES Chief Executive

We are writing to let you know what is happening on childcare and family friendly policies in DfEE and ES and to emphasise our commitment to continue to make progress in this area.

DfEE is responsible for developing the National Childcare Strategy and for promoting good practice in family friendly employment. DfEE and ES must lead the way to help our own staff balance their work and home lives and to encourage other employers to do the same. We want to keep our skilled and talented people, supporting them to remain in, or return to, work.

DfEE and ES already have an extensive range of childcare and family friendly provision which includes:

Subsidised nurseries and holiday playschemes in some locations.

Maternity leave on 16 weeks full pay for permanent staff with 1 years service.

Paid paternity leave for 5 days.

Adoptive leave for 52 weeks including 20 days at full pay.

Payment for additional childcare costs where people have to work longer than their normal hours, for example to attend a training course.

Discretion for managers to agree special paid and unpaid leave.

Career breaks for women and men.

Provision for part-time working—10% of DfEE and 21% of ES staff currently work part-time.

A wide variety of flexible working patterns including job share, homeworking, part year or term time working and compressed hours working.

But we want to do more. In recent months, DfEE and ES have taken a number of steps to move the childcare and family friendly strategy forward.

DfEE has:

carried out a benchmarking exercise to determine what leading major employers are doing and measured ourselves against them. We will be publishing a summary of the results within the next few months:

undertaken a Carers' Survey to get views about a range of childcare and family friendly issues. We are now taking this a step further and will very shortly be carrying out a needs analysis on each site; carried our research into eligibility criteria of childcare voucher schemes and prepared illustrative costings to help us decide whether vouchers are a feasible option;

called together a cross-Whitehall Departmental Working Group to determine how an affordable and targeted childcare voucher scheme might work; agreed to extend payment for additional childcare costs to wider caring responsibilities; issued guidance for all staff on family friendly policies and flexible working patterns.

ES has:

set out its intentions to be a leader in the field of equal opportunities in a letter to all staff from the Chief Executive;

issued booklets on setting up a nursery and a playscheme;

developed options on childcare for consideration by the ES Board; set up an Action Group to consider issues on part-time and family friendly policies, sponsored by a member of the ES Board; prepared a leaflet for all staff outlining current family friendly policy provision to be issued in the next few weeks; surveyed, in one region, the specific childcare needs of staff.

We will continue this work. DfEE is currently investigating local nursery and playscheme partnerships which we could join. ES is exploring the use of local partnerships with the Benefits Agency to provide additional childcare places. Both DfEE and ES are looking to see how we can use our family friendly policies to the full. We also need to publicise them more effectively.

Management and trade unions are working together on these issues. DfEE and ES will continue to share knowledge and good practice. Our managers have a critical role in developing the Department as a family friendly employer. We look to them to play their part too.

If you are interested in further information on any of the above issues, you can contact:

Outdoor Education

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to review outdoor education in the context of the National Curriculum; and if he will make a statement. [75857]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The review of the National Curriculum for the year 2000 is looking at all areas of the school curriculum. This includes outdoor and adventurous activities, which is one of six areas of activity in the National Curriculum for Physical Education. We will be consulting widely on proposals for the revised National Curriculum in the summer.

Mature Students

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total number of applications from mature students to universities in England and Wales in each of the last three years. [75076]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 9 March 1999]: This information is given in the following table.

Applications from mature[1] students to higher education courses[2] in England and Wales

Year of entry	Number of applications[3]
1996	333,111
1997[4]	334,767
1998[4]	281,499

[1] Aged 21 or over

[2] Full-time and sandwich undergraduate courses

[3] Each applicant can make up to six applications

[4] Including applications to Art and Design courses which were included in the UCAS scheme for the first time in 1997.

The figures cover applications for full-time and sandwich students only, and exclude applications to part-time courses, which account for more than half of all mature undergraduate students. Early figures show that home and EU part-time numbers in England in 1998–99 are up by around 1 per cent.

The number of applications is not a reliable guide to the number of students who actually accept places; figures for the UK show that the number of mature students accepted for entry to full-time courses in 1998 exceeded the number accepted in 1996.

The fall in mature applications between 1997 and 1998 is attributable, at least in part, to demographic factors, the declining pool of potential mature applicants and the relative strength of the labour market. In addition, the surge in students admissions in 1997 meant that fewer prospective students were expected to apply in 1998.

Complete figures for applications for 1999 entry are not yet available.

Examinations (Availability in Foreign Languages)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will make a statement on the availability of GCSE and A level examinations in Somali; [75740]

(2) if he will make a statement on the availability of GCSE and A level examinations in Hindi. [75781]

Mr. Mudie: Somali has never been offered at either GCSE or A level. Hindi is currently offered at A level but not GCSE. Last year, at the Government's instigation, the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority secured an agreement with the awarding bodies to ensure that small entry A level language examinations which are currently available should continue to be offered without interruption.

The Institute of Linguists offers Contemporary Language Certificates in Hindi and Somali which have been approved for use in schools.

Education Business Partnerships

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the benefits to pupils' education of participation in the activities of education business partnerships. [75618]

Ms Estelle Morris: Successive studies have demonstrated that education business partnerships make an important contribution to raising standards and to preparing young people for the world of work.

Salary Levels

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received regarding disparities in salary levels between lecturers in the further education sector and teachers in the school sector. [75643]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Department has received a number of letters about salaries of lecturers in sixth form colleges as compared with those of teachers in state schools. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently had a constructive meeting on a wide range of issues with the National Joint Council for Staff in Sixth Form Colleges.

Pupil Turnover

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effect of high levels of turnover in pupil enrolments on school performance. [75752]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 9 March 1999]: We are seeking further information about the nature and extent of pupil mobility, and its effect on school and pupil performance. That is why we are supporting a research project into pupil mobility, conducted by the Migration Research Unit at University College London. We expect preliminary results from the project to be available in July, and hope the outcomes will provide a focus for proper debate and discussion of the issue of mobility and school and pupil performance. We will keep the House informed of progress in this important area.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many of the education action zones have identified high levels of (a) turnover in pupil enrolments and (b) absenteeism as contributing to underperformance in their participating schools; and what initiatives they have put in place to address these problems. [75715]

Ms Estelle Morris: It is likely that all 25 existing zones have problems with pupil attendance; and most of them contain at least some schools with high pupil mobility.

The zone action plans are due to be delivered to the Department at the end of this month. They will set out the initiatives that are to be put in place to address this problem.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many LEA education development plans have identified high levels of (a) absenteeism and (b) turnover in pupil enrolments, as factors affecting the performance of schools. [75716]

Ms Estelle Morris: Local education authorities' final education development plans were submitted to the Department on 28 February 1999. These are currently being considered. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as the information becomes available and will place a copy of the letter in the Library.

Discretionary Grants

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list (i) the names of the beneficiaries of all the discretionary grants awarded by his Department to organisations within Worcestershire during 1998, (ii) their monetary value, (iii) their total value and (iv) the proportion that that total sum comprises of the total sums awarded by his Department in discretionary grants in 1998. New Deal

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 3 February 1999, Official Report, columns 661–62, for what reasons his answer did not indicate how many persons aged 18 to 24 years (a) have been invited to join the New Deal and failed to keep any appointments and (b) started the New Deal but subsequently dropped out. [71643]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of this question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. James Clappison, dated 17 February 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply to your question about the reasons why questions 66965 and 66966 were not answered in his reply on 3 February. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

I am sorry if my earlier reply was unclear.

As to those persons aged 18 to 24 years who have been invited to join the New Deal but who have failed to keep any appointments, I said in my earlier reply that of the 203, 100 young people who had started New Deal by the end of November, 14,170 signed off Jobseeker's Allowance before attending their initial appointment. All of the 14,170 therefore left before attending any appointment. We do not monitor centrally the number of young people who fail to attend their initial appointment but who do attend a second or subsequent appointment. Where a young person fails to attend interviews with an Adviser but continues to claim Jobseeker's Allowance a referral of their claim to an Adjudication Officer will normally be made. Up to the end of November 1998, 2,577 such referrals had been made.

As to those who started the New Deal but subsequently dropped out, my earlier reply said that, up to the end of November 1998, 22,760 young people had left New Deal and Jobseeker's Allowance to unknown destinations which I had taken to be the information which was being sought.

I would be very grateful if you would write to me if I am still not providing the specific information you are seeking in order that I may try to do so.

I hope this is helpful.

University for Industry

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress in relation to the University for Industry. [75354]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 10 March 1999]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on 8 March 1999, Official Report, column 74.

Individual Learning Accounts

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the operation of individual learning accounts. [75355]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 10 March 1999]: A national framework for individual learning accounts will be established in the year 2000, within which all learning accounts will operate. Proposals for the national framework will be published in due course. These will include details of the incentives for learning accounts, announced by the Chancellor in his statement yesterday. There will be significant developments in 1999–2000 in advance of the national framework, involving a range of local, sectoral and national organisations.

Class Sizes

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been spent to date on achieving the Government's target that no Key Stage 1 pupil will be in a class of more than 30 pupils; and what is his estimate of the total expenditure that will be incurred to meet the target. [74741]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have allocated £221 million to local education authorities and schools to enable them to make a start in implementing our pledge that by September 2001 at the latest, there will be no infant classes of more than 30 pupils. We have made available a total of £620 million for the additional teachers and classrooms required to implement our pledge.

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list by region the amounts spent to date on (a) employing extra teachers and (b) building new classrooms in order for schools to ensure that no five to seven-year-olds are in classes with more than 30 pupils; and what is his estimate of the total expenditure that will be incurred. [74735]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have made available a total of £620 million in order to ensure that we meet in full our pledge that, by September 2001 at latest, no infant class will contain more than 30 pupils. The following table sets out the allocations we have made for 1998–99 and 1999–2000 by region.

Failing Schools

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what criteria are used to determine whether a school is failing; how many failing schools have been given a fresh start; what proportion of all failing schools this represents; and how many of those schools given a fresh start no longer meet the criteria for a failing school. [74774]

Ms Estelle Morris: Schools are inspected by Ofsted in accordance with the published "Framework for Inspection". Those which are judged to be failing or likely to fail to provide an acceptable standard of education are deemed to require special measures. Local Authorities adopt a wide range of strategies to improve the education of children attending schools in special measures. In two cases, schools have formally closed and a new Fresh Start school has been opened on the same site. Three schools have had Fresh Starts approved to start from this September and a further four have been submitted for approval. Taken together, these represent just under 2 per cent. of the number of schools currently judged to be failing. New schools are not subject to special measures.

Education Action Zones

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress in introducing education action zones. [74768]

Ms Estelle Morris: There are 25 Education Action Zones; 12 started in September 1998 and 13 in January 1999. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a new application round in January which will enable more Education Action Zones to be established.

Press Notices

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if his departmental press office staff telephoned media outlets in Cumbria asking them not to use press notice LPN 41/99; [76186]

(2) on how many occasions since 1 May 1997 his Department's press notices have been withdrawn for reasons other than that they contained inaccuracies; [76187]

(3) on how many occasions his Department has withdrawn a press notice because of representations from a county council since 1 May 1997; [76188]

(4) if press notice LPN 41/99 was (a) issued and (b) officially withdrawn. [76192]

Ms Estelle Morris: LPN 41/99 was issued on 24 February 1999. No local or national press notices have been withdrawn since 1 May 1997.

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Social Affairs Council on 9 March indicating the position taken by the UK Government on each issue discussed. [76195]

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the outcome of the Social Affairs Council held in Brussels on 9 March; and if he will make a statement. [76749]

Mr. Andrew Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was unable to attend this meeting of the Council due to the timing of the Budget. I attended in his place.

The morning session consisted of a meeting with Ministers for Employment and Social Affairs from the candidate countries of central and eastern Europe and Cyprus to discuss their pre-accession priorities for action in the social and employment fields.

In the afternoon, the Presidency gave an oral report on the informal meeting of Employment and Social Affairs Ministers which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry and I attended in Bonn on 4–6 February. The Presidency also reported on its ideas for a European Employment Pact.

The Council noted the 1999 Work Programme for the Employment and Labour Market Committee and adopted a Decision to reform the Standing Committee on Employment by streamlining its operations and aligning its remit with the European employment strategy.

The Council reached political agreement on a draft Resolution on a Code of Conduct between authorities concerning the combating of social security fraud and undeclared work, and on the transnational hiring-out of workers.

The Presidency reported on the negotiations on the European Commission's proposals for organising the working time of the sectors excluded from the scope of the Working Time Directive. I raised UK concerns that any proposals should not undermine the delivery of health care in the NHS.

The Presidency outlined its plans to secure agreement on employee involvement within the European Company Statute.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 15 March 1999

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Brit Awards

Mr. Maclean: To ask the President of the Council if she will list those Ministers in her Department who were present at the recent Brit Awards in an official capacity, indicating the organisation acting as their sponsor or host. [76649]

Mrs. Beckett: Neither I nor the Parliamentary Secretary attended the Brit Awards.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ministerial Statements

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what steps she proposes to take to ensure that copies of ministerial statements and accompanying documents are available in the Vote Office at No 7 Millbank on the day of the statement. [76576]

Mrs. Roe: The Vote Office endeavours to arrange distribution of ministerial statements throughout the Parliamentary estate on the same afternoon that such statements are made, where considerations of security, timing and the quantity of documents make this possible. However, it would be impracticable for the Vote Office to undertake always to distribute unknown quantities of documents which often arrive very late (or even sometimes after a statement) unless a van was made permanently available to the office, which would not be economic.

PRIME MINISTER

EU Budget (Contributions)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of possible increases in United Kingdom contributions to the EU budget which do not involve modifying the Fontainebleau rebate procedures. [75059]

The Prime Minister: The UK is arguing that spending on the existing Union should be stabilised at its present levels by 2006. This will ensure that the present member states can afford the additional costs of enlargement to central and eastern Europe. Stabilisation will help to keep down the largest net contributions, including the UK's "Co-financing" and other reforms of the CAP also have a role here.

Even with these measures the Fontainebleau arrangements will remain justified. Even after the rebate the UK's net contribution will remain much larger than those of some more prosperous states.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 1 March 1999, Official Report, columns 527–28, on economic and monetary union, if he will list the microeconomic reforms he has put in place which will contribute to the passing of the five economic tests for joining the euro. [75164]

The Prime Minister: The Treasury's assessment of the five economic tests, published in October 1997, concluded that "weaknesses remain in the UK which make it unclear that we are ready to be able to cope adequately with potential shocks that might arise in EMU, especially in the early years. The Government's welfare to work programme and the agendas for improving skills and competition will help to remove the underlying weaknesses that remain and improve the prospects of being ready to meet the flexibility test in years to come".

Chernobyl

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has made to the Ukranian Government regarding future power production at Chernobyl; and if he will make a statement. [75938]

The Prime Minister: Last year, in my capacity as G7 Chairman, I wrote to Ukranian President Kuchma on three occasions. These letters covered a number of issues relating to the G7/Ukraine Memorandum of Understanding on the closure of Chernobyl, including the safety improvements being carried out at the plant, the importance of power sector reform in Ukraine and the proposed financing package for the completion of the Khmulnitsky 2 and Rovno 4 nuclear power reactors. In particular, I consistently stressed the need for Ukraine to honour its commitment to close Chernobyl by the year 2000, as agreed under the Memorandum.

EU Fraud

Mr. Field: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the steps taken to work with the European Commission in countering fraud at EU level; and if he will publish the memoranda submitted by Her Majesty's Government to the President of the European Commission. [76199]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The Government believe that there must be a policy of zero tolerance to fraud and have consistently supported the European Commission in initiatives to fight fraud against the EC budget.

At the January ECOFIN Council, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor called for a strong, independent head of fraud investigations, reporting to an independent management board. These ideas are being used in discussions currently taking place on how to strengthen internal fraud investigations. Following this, the Government offered practical assistance to the Commission, specifically offering to share UK experience of best practice on codes of conduct for behaviour in public life. I am pleased to say that this offer was welcomed and officials have been in contact to take this forward. It is among the issues that will be covered in joint training with Commission officials and officials from other Member States starting in September of this year.

The Government have not submitted a memorandum to the European Commission regarding countering fraud at EU level.

Special Advisers

Mr. Drew: To ask the Prime Minister what arrangements he plans to make for the appointment of special advisers following devolution for Scotland and Wales. [77193]

The Prime Minister: An amendment has been made to the Civil Service Order in Council to allow for the appointment of a limited number of Special Advisers to Ministers in the Scottish Parliament and Assembly Secretaries in the National Assembly for Wales. The amendment takes account of the new ministerial arrangements that will apply in Scotland and Wales following devolution, and sets out the terms and conditions under which they can be employed including an upper limit on the numbers that can be appointed. A copy of the amended Order has been placed in the Library of the House.

Gibraltar

Mr. Austin: To ask the Prime Minister what recent discussions he has had with the Prime Minister of Spain about Gibraltar with particular reference to (a) frontier delays and (b) the allegations made by the Spanish Foreign Minister about criminal activity in Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement. [76659]

The Prime Minister: In the last month, I have discussed the delays at the Gibraltar/Spain border twice with the Spanish Prime Minister, Sr. Aznar, most recently on 25 February. I made it clear that we regarded the delays as unacceptable and unjustifiable.

The Spanish Foreign Minister's remarks were made after my meeting on 25 February. I have not discussed them with Sr. Aznar. Sr. Aznar's staff handed over on 26 February a paper referring to some alleged cases of criminal activity in Gibraltar. We have been looking into these allegations, together with the relevant Gibraltar authorities, and expect to respond very shortly.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Prime Minister what reasons underlie the length of time taken to grant to Gibraltar the ability to passport financial services. [76581]

The Prime Minister: In June 1997, after discussion with the Department of Trade and Industry, the Gibraltar Financial Services Commission was authorised to "passport" Gibraltar-based insurance companies to operate in the United Kingdom and elsewhere in the European Union. Authorisation for "passporting" in the fields of banking and investment services will be granted when the relevant financial services regulatory authorities in the United Kingdom are satisfied that Gibraltar has introduced the necessary legislation and regulatory structure and procedures.

British-Irish Council

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Prime Minister when the British-Irish Council will be established; and if he will make a statement. [76999]

The Prime Minister: The British-Irish Council (BIC) will be established immediately on entry into force of the Good Friday Agreement reached at Belfast on 10 April 1998. Membership of the BIC will comprise representatives of the British and Irish Government, of the devolved institutions in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales, and the Isle of Man, Jersey and Guernsey. Its secretariat will be provided by the British and Irish Governments in co-ordination with officials of each of the other members. I have asked the Minister for the Cabinet Office to take responsibility within the British Government for matters relating to the BIC, including the necessary preparatory work.

Intelligence Service

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will review the access that the Foreign Affairs Committee has to appropriate intelligence material and witnesses from the Secret Intelligence Service. [71827]

The Prime Minister: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office gave the Foreign Affairs Committee unprecedented access to key official documents for the purpose of its inquiry on Sierra Leone. It is the Government's view that the Intelligence and Security Committee, set up by the previous Government under the Intelligence Services Act 1994, is the appropriate forum for Parliamentary oversight of the Intelligence Agencies. The Intelligence and Security Committee has been conducting its own inquiry into Sierra Leone. No previous Administration has ever agreed to witnesses from the Secret Intelligence Service appearing before Select Committees.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Asset Management

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what assessment the Commissioners have made of the cost benefit of co-ordinating management of assets with churches of other Christian denominations in England. [76043]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The Church Commissioners act as trustees for the management of their own endowment and have no general power to offer investment management for others. However, they are always willing, with their partners in the Archbishops' Council, to consider ways of furthering co-operation with other Churches.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

David Arundel

Mr. Randall: To ask the Attorney-General if, when deciding whether to refer back to the Court of Appeal the sentence imposed on David Arundel for causing death by dangerous driving (T980326), he had access to a transcript of the judge's summing up. [76024]

The Attorney-General: When I consider cases in the context of part IV of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (unduly lenient sentences) I am provided with all the necessary case papers. Ordinarily, this will not include a transcript of the judge's summing up and I did not have such a transcript when considering the sentence imposed on David Arundel. I did have a transcript of the judge's remarks regarding sentence made on 9 June 1998 and a transcript of the judge's sentencing remarks on 3 July 1998.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Task Forces

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish a list of (1) task forces and (2) policy reviews established by his Department since May 1997 which (a) had external members recruited by way of public advertisement, and details of any person so appointed and (b) engaged in public consultation exercises, and the form that these took. [74468]

Mr. Chris Smith: The following task forces and policy reviews have been established since May 1997:

1. Task forces

(i) Creative Industries Taskforce.

(ii) The Football Taskforce.

(iii) The Film Policy Action Committee.

(iv) A group of sponsorship experts assisting sports currently in receipt of tobacco sponsorship to find replacement sponsors.

2. Policy Reviews

(i) Review of Film Policy.

(ii) Review of arrangements for celebrating the Millennium.

(iii) Review of the National Lottery leading to the White Paper.

(iv) Review of Policy on admission charging by National Museums (Subsumed into the Departmental Spending Review).

(v) Review of the List of Nationally Important Sporting Events which must be made available on Free-to-Air Terrestrial TV Channels.

(vi) Review of the future of the Royal Opera House and the English National Opera (Eyre Review).

(vii) Review of the future funding of the BBC.

(viii) Review of the efficiency and effectiveness of Government sponsored museums and galleries.

(ix) Working Group on review of Legal Deposit.

(x) The Library and Information Commission's public library network implementation Committee.

(a) Most task forces and reviews are short-term bodies established to give thorough consideration to important and difficult issues. External members are invited to sit on some reviews and task forces because they are able to contribute specific experience and expertise. In such cases, public advertising would be inappropriate and disproportionate. None of the appointments to the task forces and review groups listed above were made by way of external advertisement.

Since 1 October 1998, appointments to those task forces which qualify for classification as advisory NDPBs have come within the remit of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

(b) Public consultation exercises took place with the following:

(i) The Football Taskforce—Regional roadshows allowed football supporters to give their views directly.

(ii) Review of Film Policy—An industry consultation on the work of the Film Policy Review Group took place in 1997. The consultation period was for 2 months and replies were received in writing, in addition to being submitted orally.

(iii) Review of the National Lottery—The public was asked for views on the proposals in the White Paper.

(iv) Eyre Review—The Department issued a press release inviting written views from the public.

(v) Review of the future funding of the BBC—The Department issued a press release inviting written views from the public.

(vi) Review of policy on admission charging by National Museums, subsumed into the DSR consultation—The Department issued a consultation document on 24 July 1998 inviting public views.

World-class Performance Programme

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the level of the proposed reduction in the allocation from the Sports Council for the World-class Performance Programme following the apportionment of money from the National Lottery to the New Opportunities Fund. [75336]

Mr. Banks: There will be no reduction to the World-class Performance Programme. I can confirm that the amount of Lottery money available to sport has not reduced. In fact it has increased. When the Lottery was launched, the good causes expected to receive £9 billion in total over the licence period which ends in September 2001: that is £1.8 billion for each good cause, including sport. The National Lottery is now set to raise £10.6 billion for good causes over the current licence period. On this basis Sport will receive an extra £50 million over this period.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport which World-class Performance Programme grants will be reduced following the apportionment of money from the National Lottery to the New Opportunities Fund; and which sports will be affected. [75337]

Mr. Banks: The amount of money available to sport has not reduced but will increase over the current licence period on the basis of current projections.

The allocation Lottery funding to sports and individuals who are in the World-class Performance Programme is a matter for the Sports Councils to decide at the moment on the basis of the forward plans submitted by the national governing bodies of sport and of the competing priorities. The hon. Gentleman may be assured that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are determined to support our athletes. My right hon. Friend will announce shortly what share of the Lottery Sports Fund we propose the United Kingdom Sports Council should distribute in support of excellence in UK sport and other good causes.

After-school Sports

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans the Government have to increase the availability of after-school sports provision. [75721]

Mr. Banks: There are a range of initiatives designed to increase the availability of after-school sports provision.

Through the New Opportunities Fund (NOF) we have committed £400 million of National Lottery money to out of school hours activities during the current licence period to September 2001. Of this, £180 million has been committed to education activities, £200 million to child care, and £20 million to projects combining child care and education. Out of school hours education projects should involve at least half of all secondary schools, at least a quarter of all primary schools, and at least half of all special schools by 2001. Out of school child care projects should provide places for 865,000 children by 2003.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has also announced an extra £400 million for the New Opportunities Fund between now and 2001. We have consulted on how this money should be spent and have proposed that part of the additional amount should be committed to an expansion of the existing out of school hours initiative, to enhance the contribution made by summer schools not only to literacy, numeracy but also opportunities for sport.

The Policy Directions issued to NOF ensure that it takes into account relevant national and local strategies in relation to each initiative. For out of school hours learning this includes "Extending Opportunity: a national framework for study support" (in England) and any similar guidance produced elsewhere. Study support is learning activity outside normal lessons and embraces many activities, including sports, games and adventurous outdoor activities.

The National Lottery Act 1998 required NOF to draw up a strategic plan containing its assessment of needs and its priorities in dealing with them, on which it must consult the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. This ensures that there is a proper strategy for distributing Lottery proceeds. No specific targets have been allocated to NOF for providing physical exercise opportunities at after-school clubs, but in reviewing NOF's strategic plan we shall ensure that the projects it supports promote young people's well-being through a range of activities, including sport and creative activities.

The TOP programmes are continuing to prove a valuable resource in enhancing the games element of the PE curriculum. Sport England, together with the Youth Sport Trust, are working with 126 Local Education Authorities and have put equipment and education/training into 10,000 schools. Sport England has provided funding of £1.8 million to support this delivery.

In addition to its extensive range of revenue programmes for young people, Sport England is committed to the Community Sports Co-ordinators. The Co-ordinators will act as a catalyst to assist young people to take maximum advantage of continued participation in sport by substantially improving the network between school, club and community.

The Lottery Awards for All, a unique small grants scheme, will be focused on groups who have missed out in the past. It will allow all distributors to give out grants of between £500 and £5,000 for capital revenue projects which involve people in their community and encourage school-club links. It will bring people together to enjoy sports and other activities.

Sports Grounds (Access)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what measures the Government are introducing to increase access to football and other sports grounds for people with disabilities. [75790]

Mr. Banks: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford), on 15 February 1999, Official Report, columns 470–71.

World Cup (2006)

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what future support the Government plan for England's bid to host the 2006 World Cup. [75792]

Mr. Banks: The Government will continue to provide the fullest diplomatic and promotional support for the FA's bid in accordance with FIFA bidding guidelines. I believe it is an excellent bid with a very good chance of success. My Department is currently helping the FA draft the formal bid submission. I will continue to meet members of the FIFA Executive when they visit this country and will accompany the 2006 Bid team abroad when requested.

I am determined that the FA's bid should continue to be pursued with the utmost vigour and integrity, and very much hope that the bidding process between now and March 2000 will be conducted in a spirit of friendly rivalry.

Local Authority Grants

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the types of information collected centrally by his Department on local authority grants to (a) arts organisations, (b) museums and (c) libraries. [75568]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 9 March 1999]: Although the bulk of the information my Department uses on local authority expenditure is collected by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my Department has, since 1998, required all library authorities to provide it with Annual Library Plans, containing structured information about their services and forward strategy and solicits, in a number of individual cases, detailed information on library expenditure.

Rugby World Cup

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many meetings he has had with the officials of (a) the International Board and (b) the Welsh Rugby Union to discuss contingency plans if the Millennium Stadium in Cardiff is not ready for the Rugby World Cup. [75855]

Mr. Michael: I have been asked to reply.

I have had no such meetings.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many meetings he has had with the Welsh Rugby Union to discuss the pricing of tickets for the Rugby World Cup. [75854]

Mr. Banks: Neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State nor I have had any meetings with the Welsh Rugby Union to discuss the pricing of tickets for the Rugby World Cup. However, in response to recent questions in the House, I have made written representations to Keith Rowlands, Chief Executive of Rugby World Cup 1999, supporting their pricing policy for the pool matches which is aimed at broadening public access, whilst expressing concern about the cost of tickets for the semi-final and final tickets. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is in the lead for the Government on matters relating to this competition.

Libraries (Cumbria)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on Cumbria's first Annual Library Plan. [76160]

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has sent every library authority, including Cumbria, both an overall appraisal of all the 1998 Annual Library Plans and individual feedback about their own. The individual feedback is confidential, but each authority can publicise their own if they wish.

Libraries

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list, by local authority, those local authority supported libraries which are proposed for closure; and if he will make a statement. [76390]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 12 March 1999]: I am aware of possible library closures in a number of authorities and I am looking in detail at these proposals. Some of them are part of a wider restructuring and modernisation of services, but in all cases my concern is to ensure that library authorities continue to meet their statutory responsibility to provide a 'comprehensive and efficient' service. It could be prejudicial to my inquiries to name the authorities concerned.

SCOTLAND

Dance and Drama Courses

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the possible impact on Scottish colleges of new scholarship arrangements in England for students of further and higher education courses in dance, drama and stage management; what plans he has for similar arrangements in Scotland; what body will have responsibility for accrediting dance schools in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [70362]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 11 February 1999]: The new arrangements reflect the special and significant role that private institutions have in delivering dance and drama provision in England. All EU citizens will be able to apply for assistance under the new arrangements, including the small number of Scottish students who have traditionally gone to England for specialist courses. There is no evidence that there will be an adverse impact on Scottish colleges from the new arrangements, but we are monitoring the position. Further education colleges in Scotland are already eligible for grant-in-aid support from the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department budget for dance and drama activity, and are encouraged to develop provision in response to demonstrated needs and demands. We have no plans at this time to introduce any new arrangements in Scotland.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 14 January 1999, Official Report, column 232, if he will list the expenditure not included in his answer incurred (a) by task forces and review bodies, (b) by focus groups, (c) on market research and (d) for publications and publicity; and if he will list the bodies which incurred the expenditure. [71023]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 15 February 1999]: A total of £14,000 was spent on market research and £25,000 on publications and publicity. The expenditure was incurred by the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department (Parents Focus Group); the Scottish Office Agriculture, Environment and Fisheries Department (Rural Water Review); and the Scottish Office Department of Health (Acute Services Review).

Overseas Travel

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 10 February 1999, Official Report, column 280, if he will estimate the total expenditure on all forms of travel by his Department, its agencies and public bodies for (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1997–98, (d) 1998–99, (e) 1999–2000 and (f) 2000–01; and if he will make a statement. [71751]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 22 February 1999]: Travel expenditure incurred by my Department and Executive Agencies is set out in the table. Information relating to other public bodies is not held centrally. Budgets at this level of detail are not yet available for future years.

Year	£
1995–96[1]	3,310,000

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Working Time Directive

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the effect the Working Time Directive will have on the provision of emergency medical and fire services on the smaller islands of Argyll and Ayrshire. [72262]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 22 February 1999]: The EU Working Time Directive does not apply at present in the maritime sector and therefore has no impact on the provision of emergency services to the islands.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate outpatient waiting times for the quarter ended December 1998; and if he will make a statement. [74889]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Provisional figures for the quarter ending 31 December 1998 show that the percentage of patients who received a first outpatient appointment within 9 weeks and 18 weeks following referral by a General Medical Practitioner/General Dental Practitioner was 63.6 per cent. and 88.0 per cent. respectively.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Operations (Cancellation)

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library figures by (a) health board area, (b) region and (c) Scotland, for the number of operations cancelled on the day of, or the day after, admission to a hospital, and the numbers of those patients not readmitted within a month, by quarter for the last two years. [74996]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Information on cancellations of hospital admissions at the level of detail requested is not held centrally. Details of cancellations of planned admissions for in-patient and day case treatment for each Health Board in Scotland for the period requested is provided in the table. Information on cancellations of hospital planned admissions is published annually in the NHS in Scotland Annual Report, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Hospitals (Payphones)

Mr. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will issue instructions to hospitals that normal BT call charges should apply to all payphones within their hospitals. [76150]

Mr. Galbraith: No. The provision of a telephone service for use by patients and visitors, including the choice of provider, is a matter for individual trusts. Detailed guidance on the setting of fees and charges by NHS trusts is contained in the Treasury publication "The Fees and Charges Guide". Where a service is to be provided by a third party, trusts, should ensure best value both for the hospital and the user by seeking tenders from potential operators.

From 1 July, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Health Authority Finances

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the estimated surplus or deficit of each health authority in 1998–99. [74993]

Mr. Galbraith [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The following table provides the information requested for Health Boards and Special Health Boards. The table identifies forecast underspends for each of the Health Boards for 1998–99, and is prepared on a cash basis.

NHS Trusts

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the salaries (1) with and (2) without pension contributions for the chief executives and chairmen of each NHS trust in Scotland for the years (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02. [76144]

Mr. Galbraith: Discussions are currently underway with HM Treasury on revised pay arrangements for general and senior managers. Details of the revised arrangements will be published in the usual way once agreement has been reached. Remuneration for new Trust Chairmen is also under review but is likely to be around £600,000 in total for 28 Trusts in Scotland for each of the years requested; this is approximately £250,000 less than current annual remuneration. Chairmen's remuneration is non-pensionable.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the financial targets set for each NHS trust in Scotland and the surplus or deficit incurred in each year since 1992–93. [76145]

Mr. Galbraith: NHS Trusts in Scotland are required by the NHS in Scotland Management Executive to achieve three financial targets.

These financial targets are to break even on the Income and Expenditure Account, after payment of interest and dividends taking one year with another; to produce a 6 per cent. return on net relevant assets before interest and dividends; and to achieve it's External Financing Limit as set.

The table shows the surplus and deficits (after payment of interest and dividends) incurred by each Scottish NHS Trust in the years (a) 1992–93, (b) 1993–94, (c) 1994–95, (d) 1995–96, (e) 1996–97 and (f) 1997–98. Surplus and deficit figures are not yet available for 1998–99.

The deficits incurred by Trusts often arise as a result of the losses on disposal of fixed assets in-year.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the implications of the precautionary principle enshrined in the Biosafety Protocol for the Government's policy on the planting of (a) trial genetically modified crops and (b) commercial genetically modified crops. [72575]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 22 February 1999]: Throughout the recent negotiations on the Biosafety Protocol in Cartagena, the EU maintained its strong support for the inclusion of the precautionary principle in the preamble to and in the objectives of protocol. This approach is consistent with the European Community legislation controlling the release and marketing of genetically modified organisms and with the Government's general policy on the planting of trial and commercial genetically modified crops. Rigorous scientific risk assessment, carried out as part of the strict regulation of GM crops, identifies appropriate risk management measures to ensure that risks are reduced to a minimum. In the UK, field trials of GM crops may require risk management such as pollen barriers or isolation distances. In respect of the commercial planting of GM crops, the Government support a programme of managed development involving farm scale evaluations with full ecological monitoring. The Government believe that this approach offers sufficient safeguards to ensure that large-scale plantings do not proceed until there is sufficient evidence that a particular crop does not harm the environment.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason at the recent Biosafety Protocol meeting in Colombia the UK opposed the creation of an enabling provision to allow countries to take socio-economic factors into account in determining whether or not to import GMOs. [75092]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The UK, as a Member State of the European Union, broadly supported the text of the Protocol put forward by the Chair of the Working Group to the extraordinary Conference of the Parties which included an enabling provision on socio-economics. The compromise package put forward by the EU in the final stages of the negotiations did not seek to amend that provision.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list by title the unpublished reports into aspects of genetic modification which are held by his Department. [75100]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 March 1999]: My Department endeavours to publish all the final reports of the research contracts it funds to underpin the assessment of applications for consent to release or market genetically modified organisms. Reports are published after the research contracts are completed and when a satisfactory report has been submitted. Research contractors may also publish papers in peer reviewed scientific journals describing the work funded by my Department.

The following reports have very recently been published:

Safety of Plant Viral Inserts

Investigation of Feral Oilseed Rape Populations

Review of Parasitic Nematodes for Biological Control of Invertebrates

The following reports are currently being printed and will be available shortly:

Environmental Impact of Genetically Modified Crops (Proceedings of a Workshop sponsored by the Department)

Genetically Modified Bioinsecticides

A report on the outcome of monitoring releases of Plant Genetics System's hybrid oilseed rape, which was carried out by the National Institute of Agricultural Botany (NIAB) is being prepared for publication. My Department aims to publish this by July this year.

Copies of all the reports listed above will be made available for the House of Commons Library.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research he has undertaken into the impact on water companies' ability to meet individual pesticide and herbicide limits in drinking water of the application of glufosinate and glyphosate to genetically modified crops. [75901]

Mr. Meacher: The Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 prescribe an extremely strict standard of 0.1 microgrammes per litre for individual pesticides. Since 1989 water companies have been obliged to enter into legally binding programmes to install pesticide removal processes whenever water supplies have exceeded the standard.

The pesticide removal programmes have been completed and in 1997, around 99.96 per cent. of all analyses for pesticides complied with the standard.

Glufosinate and glyphosate both degrade rapidly in the environment, but, were they present in water sources, they would be removed by the treatment processes that have been installed.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make available the locations of genetically modified trial crops to water companies. [75900]

Mr. Meacher: Water companies may obtain information on the locations of genetically modified crop trials from the statutory public register, held in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. Information on the location of trial sites is also available on the Department's website.

Applicants for consent to release genetically modified organisms must advertise locally where the release will take place. This is a public notice in a local newspaper. If the proposed release may have an impact on any controlled waters, then the Environment Agency is notified.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he has taken to improve the regulation of genetically modified crops. [74097]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The release of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) is governed by EC Directive 90/220. The European Commission published its proposal to amend the Directive in February 1998 and since then the UK Government have played an active role in negotiating the draft amending Directive. The Commission's proposal seeks to make a number of significant changes to the Directive, such as strengthening provisions on environmental risk assessment and monitoring, streamlining some procedures, ensuring greater transparency and better labelling requirements, and providing for the consultation of EU ethics and scientific committees. The Government have been active in their support for revision of the Directive to ensure full protection for human health and the environment.

In the Government's view the amendment should be taken forward seriously and rapidly. At the Environment Council this week, I intend to press the German Presidency to devote time to this dossier with a view to securing common position at the June Council.

Pending the revision of the Directive, EU Environment Ministers agreed in December 1998 to use the flexibility within the existing Directive to introduce new principles on risk assessment and monitoring. These new requirements, based on provisions in the draft amending Directive, were adopted as a direct result of public concerns about GMOs and the European Parliament's call for action. The new principles on risk assessment and monitoring will allow a clearer picture to be built up of the direct and indirect, and immediate and delayed, effects of GMOs on the environment.

On top of the new EC requirements, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I announced before the House of Lords Select Committee on 21 October 1998 that the Government have reached agreement with the plant breeding industry for a managed development programme for herbicide tolerant GM crops. Farm-scale evaluations will ensure that first commercial plantings of herbicide tolerant GM crops will be strictly limited and monitored for ecological effects alongside comparable plantings of conventional crops. The Government are funding ecological studies of the diversity and abundance of plants and invertebrates associated with the management of GM and non-GM crops to test whether there are any significant differences, initially over a four year period. This will assist consideration of what effects GM crops may have on higher species and our agricultural landscape. If ecological monitoring reveals adverse effects then appropriate action will be taken.

Biosafety Protocol

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out the negotiating position of the UK delegation to the biosafety protocol discussions in Cartagena, Colombia; what support Britain gave to proposals from the Miami Group; and at what stages Britain supported moves which would exempt genetically modified ingredients from the clear labelling and advance notification proposals. [73980]

Mr. Meacher: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 9 February 1999, Official Report, columns 153–54, which set out the UK's negotiating line for the meeting. The EU maintained its agreed position throughout the negotiations in Cartagena, and the UK remained firmly within that position. The UK, together with European colleagues, attempted to build a bridge between the positions adopted by most developing countries and the Miami Group. The EU did not support any proposals that would have exempted living modified organisms (LMOs) within the scope of the protocol being subject to a requirement for documentation and clear identification. An EU compromise package introduced in the final stages of the negotiations with a view to achieving consensus included a provision enabling the first Meeting of the Parties to decide whether and how the protocol's procedures would apply to the transboundary movement of LMOs for intended direct use as food or feed or for processing. This compromise package received widespread support, but proved unacceptable to the Miami Group.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason the UK at the recent Biosafety Protocol meeting in Colombia did not support inclusion of the precautionary principle in the operational articles of the Protocol. [75091]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 March 1999]: The UK goal was to secure reference to the precautionary principle in the Protocol. We therefore strongly supported the EU submission prior to the penultimate meeting on the Biosafety Protocol to include a reference to the precautionary principle in the Preamble, and in the Objective of the Protocol. The latter provides the fundamental underpin for all the provisions of the Protocol.

While these proposals were retained in the draft negotiating text for the Colombia meeting, there was considerable opposition to the inclusion of references to the precautionary principle in the last round of negotiations. In the final stages, the EU put forward a compromise package based on the text put forward by the Chair of the Working Group. The package included retaining a reference to the precautionary approach in the Preamble and in the Objective of the Protocol. In an attempt to achieve consensus, the EU was prepared to agree to delete wording based on the precautionary principle in the article dealing with the decision procedure if the reference to the precautionary principle remained in the Objective and a formulation of it was contained in general principles section of the risk assessment annex. all notifications under the Protocol would have required a risk assessment. Hence, the operational provisions of the Protocol would have been based on the precautionary principle.

Road Safety

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what actions his Department has taken to improve road safety in (a) Staffordshire and (b) the West Midlands. [74552]

Ms Glenda Jackson: As part of the New Deal for Transport, the Government will be setting new national casualty reduction targets, underpinned by a road safety strategy. These will be published later this year.

It is for Staffordshire County Council and other local authorities in the region to promote and implement, with partners, schemes to improve road safety in their area. Local safety schemes, which are low cost engineering schemes which address known accident blackspots, are a very successful means of reducing accidents, funded through the annual Local Capital Transport Settlement. In 1999–2000 the West Midlands region has been awarded £5.992 million of which £0.450 million has been allocated to Staffordshire. This represents an increase of 18% and 45% respectively over the 1998–1999 settlement year and is expected to save 671 road accident casualties per annum.

The County Council has also been awarded two new transport packages this year, the Tamworth Package and the Safe Routes to School Package. Both of these packages will provide additional measures to improve road safety in the Tamworth area.

Biological Resources

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his Department's policy in respect of the forthcoming review of Trade, intellectual property, Food and biodiversity clauses on the protection of biological resources. [74849]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 March 1999]: My Department will work with others involved in the review of the World Trade Organisation's Trade Related aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) Agreement, taking into account emerging experience of the implementation of the Agreement and bearing in mind the needs of existing and future members. We are particularly concerned to ensure that developing countries are allowed sufficient flexibility, within internationally agreed boundaries, to implement IPR regimes appropriate to their individual circumstances.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in respect of their impact on the global environment, what assessment his Department has made of the compatibility of Article 27 of Trade, intellectual property, Food and biodiversity and Articles 8, 15 and 16 of the UN Convention on Biological Resources. [74845]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 March 1999]: We consider that the World Trade Organisation's Trade Related aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) Agreement and the United Nations Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD) are compatible, but we need to ensure that they are implemented in a mutually supportive way. My department, in collaboration with others with an interest, will continue to participate in international efforts to clarify the relationship between the CBD and the TRIPS Agreement, including at the inter-sessional meeting to be held under the Convention from 28 to 30 June. Our aim is to safeguard both intellectual property and the world's biodiversity.

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list (i) the names of the beneficiaries of all the discretionary grants awarded by his Department to organisations within Worcestershire during 1998, (ii) their monetary value, (iii) their total value and (iv) the proportion that that total sum comprises of the total sums awarded by his Department in discretionary grants in 1998. Retail Developments

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make money available to local authorities to help them to enable shopping centres in town and cities to compete equally with designated out-of-town shopping areas. [75277]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government's policy is to encourage retail development in the centre of towns and cities rather than at out of town locations. This was set out in our Response to the Select Committee report on Shopping Centres [Cmnd 3729], which also reaffirmed our commitment to Planning Policy Guidance note 6 (PPG6): Town Centres and Retail Developments. Through our funding of the Association of Town Centre Management and the Civic Trust, we have been assisting local authorities to promote town centre management by preparing and disseminating good practice.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) out-of-town shopping mall and (b) superstore planning applications in England have been refused, and on what principal grounds, on appeal in the past year. [75504]

Mr. Raynsford: Planning permission has been refused, on appeal, in respect of two applications for superstores in England, in 1998, primarily on the grounds that they failed the policy tests in PPG6.

Mr. Prior: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make it his practice to publish lists of (a) all outstanding planning permissions for superstores, (b) all superstore planning appeals that have been approved in the past five years, with a summary of the reasons for the approval and (c) all superstore planning appeals that have been refused in the past five years, with a summary of the reasons for the refusal; and if he will make a statement; [75779]

(2) if he will list all superstore planning appeals that have been (a) approved and (b) rejected in the last five years; and if he will make a statement; [75688]

(3) if he will list all the outstanding planning permissions for superstores; and if he will make a statement. [75689]

Mr. Raynsford: Most decisions on planning applications for retail developments are taken by local planning authorities. They provide statistical returns on applications which they handle under the general category of "major retail, distribution and servicing". The information requested in respect of appeals is not held centrally over the timescale requested. It is, therefore, not feasible to assemble the information requested, except at disproportionate cost. We have no current plans to publish such lists.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make a statement on measures necessary to ensure millennium compliance in the systems for which the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency is responsible; when millennium compliance will be achieved; and what the latest date is by which millennium compliance must be achieved in order to remain fully operational; [75476]

(2) if the systems for which the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency is responsible are millennium compliant. [75475]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Like all other Government Departments and Agencies, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency submits quarterly reports to CCTA on progress towards millennium compliance. These reports are analysed by the Cabinet Office and from the basis of my right hon. Friend the President of the Council's reports to Parliament. It would not be appropriate for me to anticipate her next statement, but, when it is made, a copy of DVLA's report will be placed both in the Library and on the Internet. Reports will be accompanied by a series of tables that illustrate how well departments and agencies are doing against a number of specific performance criteria.

Housing Finance

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to reform housing finance; and if he will make a statement. [75635]

Mr. Raynsford: In December 1998 we issued a consultation paper "A New Financial Framework for Local Authority Housing: Resource Accounting in the Housing Revenue Account" seeking views on proposals for changes to local authority housing finance. The proposals would introduce a form of resource accounting for the Housing Revenue Account (HRA). It is also proposed to remove expenditure on rent rebates from the HRA leaving the account as a landlord account reflecting the cost of providing housing at below market rents. The aim of the proposed New Framework is to make housing accounts easier to understand for both councils and their tenants and to enable better-informed decisions about the management of housing assets. Consultations are not yet complete and there will be an announcement about our plans in due course. A copy of the consultation paper is in the Library.

Carlisle Airport

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the contribution of Carlisle Airport to the economic development of Cumbria and the Scottish Borders. [75521]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A "North of England Regional Air Services Study" has been commissioned by my Department. It is part of a number of such studies across the UK. The North of England Study is expected to report this summer, so my hon. Friend will understand that I cannot comment at this stage on the contribution of Carlisle Airport to the economic development of the Region or Cumbria and the Scottish borders until the findings of the study are known.

Brown-field Sites

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what statistics his Department collects on the number of brown-field sites in town centres redeveloped for residential use. [75511]

Mr. Raynsford: The Land Use Change Statistics published by my Department provide information on the area of land changing to residential use that was previously developed for urban uses. (Urban uses comprise residential, transport and utilities, industry and commerce, community services, previously developed vacant land and derelict land). Numbers of new dwellings built on previously developed land (excluding conversions of existing dwellings) are also recorded. This information provides statistics for the proportion of new residential development that takes place on previously developed land.

Some previously developed land is located in rural areas. My Department has developed the analysis of land use change to identify separately changes that occurred inside and outside urban areas as defined for the 1991 Census. At present it is not possible to distinguish those land use changes that occurred within town centres, but this might become possible following research under way to define the boundaries of town centres for statistical purposes.

The latest results of the Land Use Change Statistics, together with more information about how they are compiled, were published in the statistical bulletin "Land Use Change in England No. 13", a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

Maritime Rescue Subcentres

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many watch-keeping staff were in post on 30 September 1998 at Tyne Tees Maritime Rescue subcentre; and what was the (a) monthly and (b) daily officer incident rate. [75829]

Ms Glenda Jackson: On 30 September 1998 there were 13.5 watch keeping staff in post at Tyne Tees. The (a) monthly officer incident rate was 2.84 and (b) the daily officer incident rate was 0.09.

A596/A597, Workington

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will include proposals for an improvement at the A596/A597 junction at Workington as a priority scheme under the programme of network enhancement projects. [75414]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 10 March 1999]: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours, dated 15 March 1999:

The Transport Minister, Glenda Jackson, has asked Lawrie Haynes to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the improvement of the A595/A597 junction at Workington. I am replying on Lawrie's behalf in his absence.

We have drawn up our programme of Local Network Management schemes for 1999/2000. In doing so we have had to consider competing priorities across the trunk road network. As a result, I am sorry to have to tell you that at present we are unable to include the improvement of the A596/A597 junction in the programme.

As you know, the A596 is one of the trunk routes in Cumbria identified as non-core and which it is proposed to detrunk as part of the Government's integrated transport policy. I understand that you are aware that a delegation from Cumbria County Council and Copeland Borough Council made representations about the detrunking proposals at a recent meeting with Transport Ministers, Dr. John Reid and Lord Whitty. Those representations are being considered together with others, and a final decision by Ministers on the split of the network into core and non-core routes will be announced as soon as possible.

If the A596 is confirmed as a non-core route to be detrunked then from 1 April 2000 the Agency will only initiate further improvements that it considers necessary to keep the route in a safe and serviceable condition. It will be for Cumbria County council to consider the need for other improvements in the context of their Local Transport Plan. Provisional plans covering the period 2000/01–2004/05 are due to be submitted by the end of this July.

SSSIs

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to take further measures to protect sites of special scientific interest. [76379]

Mr. Meacher: We are further developing proposals put forward in the Government consultation paper, Sites of Special Scientific Interest—Better Protection and Management, taking account of the issues raised in the 562 responses. We will seek to implement legislative measures when Parliamentary time permits, but will also take forward procedural and administrative improvements at the earliest opportunity.

Planning Applications

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of appeals to the planning inspectorate by applicants against decisions taken by (a) the London Borough of Hammersmith and Fulham, (b) the London Borough of Wandsworth and (c) the City of Westminster were successful in (i) 1997 and (ii) 1998. [76270]

Mr. Caborn: I have asked the Chief Executive, of the Planning Inspectorate, Mr. Chris Shepley, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from David Hanchet to Mr. Iain Coleman, dated 15 March 1999:

As he is away from the office at present, I am writing on behalf of Chris Shepley who has been asked by the Secretary of State to reply to your Question about planning appeals in Hammersmith and Fulham, Wandsworth, and Westminster in 1997 and 1998.

For appeals decided in each year, the percentages allowed were:

Percentage

	1997	1998
Hammersmith and Fulham	24	29
Wandsworth	21	33
Westminster	29	35

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many planning applications were called in by the Secretary of State in (a) the London Borough of Hammersmith and Fulham and (b) the London Borough of Wandsworth and (c) the City of Westminster in (i) 1997 and (b) 1998. [76269]

Mr. Caborn: None in Hammersmith and Fulham, one in Wandsworth in 1997 and one in Westminster in 1998.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the (a) acreage and (b) location of contaminated land in the County of Durham. [76249]

Mr. Meale: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what advice he has given to local authorities in respect of compiling and maintaining a contaminated land register within their boundaries; and if he will make a statement. [76247]

Mr. Meale: My department will be carrying out further consultations shortly on regulations and statutory guidance necessary to implement the contaminated land regime contained in Part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 (inserted by section 57 of the Environment Act 1995).

Local authority functions under Part IIA include compilation of a register which will provide details about regulatory action and remediation on land formally identified as contaminated land.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the local authorities in the Northern Region which hold a detailed contaminated land register; and if he will make a statement. [76248]

Mr. Meale: There is no statutory requirement for local authorities to keep registers of contaminated land. Individual authorities may maintain records about land contamination, but there is no information held centrally about which authorities do so.

South Downs

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish proposals for the future management of the South Downs; and if he will make a statement. [76370]

Mr. Meacher: We are still looking very carefully at the issues. We hope to announce some conclusions soon.

Packaging Industry

Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what discussions he has had with representatives of the packaging industry on the recovery targets set for the packaging industry up to 2001; what assessment he has made of the ability of the industry to achieve such targets; and if he will make a statement; [76215]

(2) when he plans to make a statement on the future operation of the Packaging Waste Recovery Notes System; [76216]

(3) what is his estimate of the number of businesses in the packaging industry that will be exempt from the packaging waste obligations as a result of a change in the financial turnover cut-off threshold to £2 million. [76217]

Mr. Meacher: A consultation paper was published on 30 July 1998 which included proposals to increase the interim business recovery and recycling targets in 1999 and 2000 and over 350 responses were received. The UK packaging recovery rate is expected to have reached approximately 32 per cent. in 1998 and the interim business targets are designed to enable the UK to achieve the mandatory EC Directive recovery and recycling targets in 2001. Industry itself has reported that there was an oversupply of reprocessing capacity in 1998 compared with the targets that had to be met and this was damaging the market. The increase in the interim business recovery and recycling targets should therefore generate the necessary momentum to enable sufficient activity to be carried out to achieve the 2001 targets. A further consideration was the need for sufficient resources to be directed at generating the necessary collection and reprocessing capacity that will be needed to meet targets in 2001. With this additional infrastructure in place, the UK should be able to meet these mandatory targets.

I expect to make a statement about the future operation of the Packaging Waste Recovery Note System very shortly.

The Department's current estimates suggest that some 4,500 smaller businesses will be excluded from the scope of the Regulations as a result of the change to the financial turnover cut-off threshold in 2000.

Pensioners' Housing

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what evidence is provided by the English House Conditions Survey and the Survey of English Housing on the quality of housing of pensioners aged over 80 years in relation to that of other pensioner households. [76099]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The table from the 1996 English House Condition Survey indicates that pensioners aged over 80 years are much more likely to live in poor quality housing than pensioners below that age. The likelihood of the latter living in poor quality housing is on average not that much different from the population as a whole.

Percentage of pensioners in poor quality homes, by age group

	Percentage of people in each age group: (a) living in		(b)
	i. unfit homes[1]	ii. poor housing[2]	without central heating
Pensionersaged 81+	9	23	18
Pensionersaged 80 or less	5	14	12
all ages	6	13	11

[1] Unfit homes refer to properties assessed as unfit according to the standard defined by Section 604 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.
[2] Poor housing refers to homes that are either unfit, in substantial disrepair or requiring essential modernisation.

Footpaths

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the appeal by St. Leonard's and St. Ives Parish Council against the refusal of Dorset County Council to modify the definitive map to add five footpaths at Lions Hill, St Leonard's was made; and on what date he expects it to be determined. [76470]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 12 March 1999]: This appeal was received by the Government Office for the South West in January 1997. The determination process has now reached an advance stage and the decision should be issued by the end of this month.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many employees of the Government Office for the South West are allocated to the determination of appeals involving footpaths. [76471]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The Government Office for the South West has a team of eight staff dealing with the determination of appeals including rights of way cases.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the earliest date of a case involving a footpath appeal which is still awaiting determination by the Government office in Bristol; and how many more recent cases are awaiting determination. [76469]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The earliest footpath appeals awaiting determination are a group of nine interlinked appeals which completed the necessary procedural stages in January 1997. There are 21 more such cases awaiting determination.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many right of way appeals are currently outstanding in each of the Government's regional offices. [76468]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The number of appeal cases currently outstanding in each of the Government's regional offices is shown in the table.

Regional Office	No. of appeals
North West	5
North East	4
Yorkshire and the Humber	10
East Midlands	2
West Midlands	5
Eastern Region	3
South West	53
South East (incl. London)	18
Total	100

Short-haired Bumble Bee

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 17 December 1998, Official Report, column 632, on the short-haired bumble bee, if he will make a statement on the preparation of the plan for the short-haired bumble bee. [76630]

Mr. Meale: An action plan for the short-haired bumble bee was included in Tranche 2 Action Plans, Volume IV—Invertebrates which was published by the UK Biodiversity Group on 8 March.

Public Rights of Way

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what (a) percentage and (b) length of public rights of way are open to (i) horseriders and (ii) cyclists in each county in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [76882]

Mr. Meacher: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

England and Wales have an estimated total of 130,000 miles (209,000 km) of rights of way, of which over 38,000 miles (61,000 km) or 29 per cent. may be used lawfully by horseriders and cyclists.

Planning (Class A3)

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will further restrict transfers of business between pubs and restaurants under the A3 planning category. [76086]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 12 March 1999]: We have no immediate plans to amend Class A3 of the Use Classes Order 1987. However, we have received representations to introduce planning controls for certain changes of use within existing Class A3 and we are currently considering these.

Trading Credit Approvals

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what information his Department collects centrally on local authority bids for trading credit approvals in 1998–99. [76448]

Ms Armstrong [holding answer 12 March 1999]: A record of applications for credit approvals outside established programmes, for 1998–99 and other years, is held by my Department.

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 8 March 1999, Official Report, column 8, if he will list the local authorities that made trading credit approval applications in 1998–99 indicating (a) the value of each application and (b) the purpose for which the trading credit approval was sought. [76447]

Ms Armstrong [holding answer 12 March 1999]: Requests by local authorities in connection with Trading Credit Approvals (TCAs) considered in 1998 were:

		£ million
Sheffield City Council	Sheffield waste incinerator	17.0
Plymouth City Council	Unrestricted TCAs for self-financing schemes	n/a
Harrogate Borough Council	Upgrading of conference centre facility	6.6

Road User Charges

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it his policy that the net proceeds from road user charges and the workplace parking levy are treated as additional to central Government funding for transport in London. [76472]

Ms Glenda Jackson: It is already government policy that any revenues from charging schemes brought forward by the Mayor or boroughs will be additional moneys for spending on measures which support the Mayor's transport strategy.

The Greater London Authority Bill will require charging authorities to maintain separate income and expenditure accounts for each charging scheme. These accounts will be published annually. This will guarantee transparency, and make it clear to Londoners that charging revenues are additional moneys.

Sewerage Works (Windermere)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the programme to improve sewerage works announced by the Minister for the Environment on 1 March will include repairs to the sewerage system at Windermere in Cumbria. [76667]

Mr. Meale: The English and Welsh water company improvement programmes announced on 1 March include improvement schemes to be carried out at three North West Water sewage treatment works affecting Lake Windermere; at Windermere, Near Sawrey and Ambleside. These schemes will protect and improve the designated bathing water at Windermere and water quality in the River Rothay.

The Environment Agency is currently investigating recent pollution incidents at Lake Windermere in liaison with North West Water and South Lakeland District Council. The Agency will continue monitoring the situation to see whether additional action is necessary.

Rents (Research)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research he has conducted to (a) current rent levels and (b) market rent levels in each London borough in the past year. [76231]

Mr. Raynsford: The Housing Corporation's January 1999 publication Guide to Local Rents (Source Research 32) sets out a comparison of average housing association, local authority and private sector rents in each local authority area, including the London boroughs. A copy has been placed in the House of Commons Library. In addition, my Department routinely collects information on average rents for all authorities for Housing Revenue Account subsidy purposes.

Road Deaths

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people died in road accidents (a) nationally and (b) in each region in each of the last three years. [76042]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of fatalities in road accidents is shown in the following table:

Fatalities in road accidents: by Government office region and severity: 1995–97

Ministerial Visits

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 4 March 1999, Official Report, column 845, whether notification of the visit by the Minister for London and Construction to Bromsgrove to the hon. Member for Bromsgrove was made on departmental notepaper. [76763]

Mr. Raynsford: No. As I made clear to the hon. Member in my reply of 4 March, this was a Labour Party campaign visit.

Brit Awards

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those Ministers in his Department who were present at the recent Brit awards in an official capacity, indicating the organisation acting as their sponsor or host. [76656]

Dr. Reid: Neither I nor any of my Ministerial colleagues in this Department attended the recent Brit awards.

Land (Access)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the legal advice which his Department has received on whether the plans to provide a statutory right of access to land would create a right to general compensation under the Human Rights Act 1998. [76451]

Mr. Meacher: It is not the practice for the Government to publish legal advice which they receive, and it is not proposed to publish any such advice in this case.

High-sided Vans

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to prohibit high-sided vans from using the outside lane on motorways with three lanes or more in one direction. [76229]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Goods vehicles with a maximum laden weight exceeding 7.5 tonnes are banned from the outside lane of motorways with three or more lanes. We believe a ban by weight is the appropriate measure and have no plans to amend the regulations to apply height restrictions.

Trains (Punctuality)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will ensure that trains re-timed to arrive later than as shown in the Great Britain passenger railway timetable are included as late trains in the statistics published on punctuality. [76230]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Franchising Director's office currently publishes information from train operators' Passenger Charters in its Quarterly Bulletin. Charter punctuality information does not normally include trains on Sundays, or trains delayed for reasons outside the control of the industry. This is likely to mean that the majority of trains with extended journeys from planned engineering works or following major incidents are excluded. The Franchising Director is currently consulting on improved public performance measures.

Mayor of London

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what conclusions he has reached concerning the types of planning application on which the new Mayor for London should be consulted by the local planning authorities as being of potential strategic importance; and if he will make a statement. [77234]

Mr. Raynsford: Under the proposals set out in the White Paper, A Mayor and Assembly for London, and reflected in the Greater London Authority Bill currently before Parliament, London boroughs and the City of London will remain the planning and development control authorities for their areas. However, their Unitary Development Plans must be in general conformity with the Mayor's Spatial Development Strategy. The Mayor must also have a means of representing the broader pan-London view for individual planning applications where issues of genuine strategic importance are concerned. The Mayor will therefore become a statutory consultee for a limited number of applications of potential strategic importance, to be defined in secondary legislation. He or she will also have a fall-back power to direct the refusal of planning permission in these cases where this is considered necessary on strategic grounds. The applicant would then have the normal right of appeal to the Secretary of State, who will also continue to be able to call in applications for his own decision where appropriate.

Last August the Government issued a consultation paper setting out our initial proposals for the categories of development on which the Mayor is to be consulted. A summary of the responses received is being placed in the Library.

Having considered the responses, we have decided that the broad categories set out in the consultation paper will be retained, but with changes to some of the sub-categories and thresholds proposed.

In summary, the categories will be:

(i) Very large scale development including:

(a) major residential developments (over 500 units or 10 ha);

(b) very large new buildings or structures (over 30,000 m^2 in the City of London; 20,000 m^2 in the rest of central London; 15,000 m^2 elsewhere);

(c) tall buildings (25m fronting the Thames; elsewhere—75m in the City of London and 30m in other areas).

(ii) Major new infrastructure projects, including:

(b) mining operations (sites of more than 10 ha);

(c) large new waste facilities (more than 50,000 tonnes capacity);

(d) new transport facilities, i.e., runways, air terminals, heliports, rail or tram lines, bus or coach stations, large freight depots, piers and river crossings on the Thames.

(iii) Applications likely to affect key strategic policies, including:

(c)the loss of housing (more than 200 units) or designated housing land (more than 4 ha);

(d) the loss of land (more than 4 ha) in use or designated for employment purposes;

(e) the loss of land (more than 2 ha) in use or designated as a playing field;

(f) development of more than 1,000 m^2 in the green belt or on designated Metropolitan Open Land;

(g) development affecting a designated strategic view;

(h) Substantial development in locations not identified in the development plan for such uses: (i) residential use (more than 150 units); (ii) commercial uses and other uses likely to generate significant new travel (more than 2,500 m^2);

(i) the provision of more than 200 car=parking spaces for non-residential purposes.

(iv) Any development on a key sit of strategic importance as designated in a consultation direction made by the Secretary of State.

A paper setting out the proposed definitions in more detail, and showing the main changes from the consultation draft, is being placed in the Library, and is available from the Government Office for London.

We believe this package represents an appropriate balance. It will ensure that the Mayor is able to have a say in key planning applications in support of his or her Spatial Development Strategy, whilst recognising that the vast majority of planning applications are properly a matter for the local planning authorities. Setting clear thresholds will provide certainty and minimise the scope for dispute. We expect that between 150 and 250 planning applications out of some 70,000 submitted in Greater London each year will fall into the categories identified above.

The Mayor will be consulted in parallel with other statutory consultees, and will have no power to delay the taking of a decision by the local planning authority. He or she will, however, have a further period of 14 days after the local planning authority has reached a view within which to use the fall-back power of direction.

Subject to Parliamentary approval, it is intended that the Order defining these categories of applications will come into effect when the Mayor begins work in July 2000. It will be subject to review and, if necessary, amendment in the light of experience and following publication of the Mayor's first Spatial Development Strategy.

London Underground

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress London Underground has made with their planned Public-Private Partnership. [77233]

Dr. Reid: London Underground are today sending a progress report on the Public-Private Partnership to those who responded to a "market sounding" consultation on the project held last year. The report sets out how the project is to be taken forward, and should help potential bidders prepare themselves before London Underground invite formal expressions of interest. A notice alerting other interested parties to the progress report will appear in the Official Journal. A copy of the report has been deposited in the Library.

Donaldson Report

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish Lord Donaldson's report on Salvage and Intervention and their Command and Control; and if he will make a statement. [77085]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am today publishing Lord Donaldson's report of Salvage and Intervention and their Command and Control and placing a copy of the Government's interim response to each of his 26 recommendations in the Library.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what official visits he, his ministers or officials have paid to Zimbabwe since May 1997; whom they met; and what was discussed. [73462]

Mr. Prescott [pursuant to his reply, 1 March 1999, c. 517–18]: There have been no official visits by DETR Ministers to Zimbabwe since May 1997.

There have been three visits by officials:

In June 1997 four Departmental officials, together with delegations from other Government Departments, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee and the Royal Botanic Gardens Kew, visited Harare for the 10th Convention of International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) Conference at which a range of issues concerning trade and endangered species were discussed.

In January 1998 a senior Departmental official represented DETR at an International Workshop on Strategic Approaches to Freshwater Management. The event was attended by some 80 countries, together with NGOs, industry and International agencies. This event was hosted by the Zimbabwe Government with EC support, and helped pave the way for the Commission for Sustainable Development's Sixth meeting at which a formal Decision on Strategic Approaches to Freshwater Management was adopted by CSD, and later endorsed by UNGASS.

Also in January 1998 two Departmental officials visited Zimbabwe's Director of Civil Aviation, Mr. A. Marawa, to discuss the possibilities for extra services to Zimbabwe by British scheduled and charter airlines.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Controls

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answers of 2 February 1999, Official Report, columns 581–82, what steps he is taking to ensure the recovery of the sums paid in claims by the ECGD to manufacturers but not recovered from defence buyers in (a) Algeria and (b) Jordan [75809]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 10 March 1999]: Algeria and Jordan are repaying the debt, arising from ECGD claims payments in respect of civil and military export contracts, under Government to Government Agreements. Both countries are meeting their obligations under the Agreements in full.

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the representations received by his Department from Scottish local authorities regarding the review of assisted area status. [75915]

Mr. Wills: Representations were received from the following Scottish Local Authorities:

Aberdeenshire Council
Angus Council
Argyll and Bute Council
Clackmannanshire Council
Dumfries and Galloway Council
Dundee City Council
East Ayrshire Council
East Lothian Council

Orkney Council
Perth and Kinross Council
Renfrewshire Council
Scottish Borders Council

West Lothian Council.

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to make his recommendations on the review of assisted area status known to (i) the Scottish Office and (ii) the European Commission. [75914]

Mr. Wills: The review of Assisted Area status is being carried out in consultation with other Government Departments including the Scottish Office. Under the European Guidelines a new Assisted Areas map for the UK must operate from 1 January 2000. Changes to the Assisted Areas map must be agreed with the Commission, and they have asked for proposals from Member States by 31 March. Ministers are currently considering which proposals they will put forward.

Debt (Late Payment)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the response by business to the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998. [76433]

Mr. Wills: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Alexander), on 10 March 1999, Official Report, columns 261–62.

Special Representative on the Digital Economy

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the job description of the Special Representative on the Digital Economy. [76197]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The Special Representative on the Digital Economy (the e-Envoy) will have two roles:

1. To spearhead the implementation of the strategy, set out in the Competitiveness White Paper, for:

   a) achieving the Government's goal of making the UK, by the end of this Parliament, the best environment in the world in which to trade electronically

   b) ensuring that UK businesses and consumers fully realise the potential this opens up

2. To advise the Secretary of State and Prime Minister on future development of the strategy. In particular:

   Monitoring progress on implementation of the strategy, and keeping the strategy under regular review in the light of international developments.

   Reviewing existing Government policies and activities relevant to the goals set out at No. 1, with a view to identifying gaps and areas for accelerated effort.

Executive responsibility for implementing the agreed strategy will principally lie with relevant departments, but the e-Envoy will also take on specific functions where agreed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Prime Minister. In particular, the e-Envoy will act as public figurehead for the Government on e-commerce issues in international discussions; promote the UK as a centre for e-commerce business and investment; and publicly champion e-commerce in the UK, spreading awareness and promoting uptake by businesses and consumers.

Fixed Capital Formation

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current rate of fixed capital formation (a) nationally, (b) in each region and (c) in other OECD countries. [76041]

Mr. Wills: The answer is as follows:

Data Protection

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the measures currently planned to be taken, pursuant to the enactment of Common Position (EC) 8/1999 (1999/c 55/01), with particular reference to (a) recitals 8 and 16, (b) their costs and (c) data privacy. [75709]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I have been asked to reply.

The Common position is that adopted by the Telecommunications Council on 21 December 1998 on a series of guidelines, including the identification of projects of common interest, for trans-European networks for the electronic Interchange of Data between Administrations (IDA). IDA aims to achieve the most efficient and cost effective means of data interchange in support of European Community policies.

The Common position relates to a second phase of IDA that will run for five years from the point of adoption. The first phase ran from 1995–1997 and supported Community policies by the development of networks for the exchange of data related to subjects including agriculture, fisheries, health, statistics, employment and customs matters. The second phase is likely to continue work in some of these areas and other areas where Member States and the European Community identify the need for data interchange.

At this stage, there are no specific proposals on exchange of information related to Recitals 8 and 16 of the Common position text. The proposed budget for the IDA guidelines proposal is estimated as euro 38.5 million for the first three years of the programme.

Any work carried forward under IDA, will take full account of the sensitivity of the data to be passed across a network and the relevant data protection legislation. Appropriate security measures will be taken to protect sensitive data.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the increase in revenue to the Exchequer in the financial year 1999–2000 as a result of (a) raising the upper earnings limit on employee national insurance contributions to £602 per week and (b) removing the upper earnings limit on employee national insurance contributions altogether. [74396]

Mr. Timms: Estimated additional revenue of some £1.8 billion would be raised in 1999–2000 if the Upper Earnings Limit on employees' Class 1 contributions was increased from its present level to the same level as the threshold of higher rate income tax, which is to be set at £622 a week from April 1999. If the Upper Earnings Limit was removed, the estimated additional revenue raised would be £4.2 billion for that year.

The figures assume that the current 10 per cent. Class 1 contribution rate would apply to earnings above the present Upper Earnings Limit, and that this limit would remain in place for the calculation of employee and employer contracted-out rebates.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of employees who will pay higher national insurance contributions as a result of the increase of the upper limit in (a) the standard rate and (b) the contracted out rate of national insurance contributions. [76454]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

Estimated average weekly numbers of employees in Great Britain who will pay more National Insurance Contributions following the increase of the upper earnings limit to £535 per week from April 2000 and to £575 per week from April 2001

	2000–01	2001–02
Contracted in employees	1,400,000	1,380,000
Contracted out employees	2,500,000	2,460,000

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many prosecutions have followed from calls made to the Benefit Fraud Hotline in each month since May 1997; and what the total annual saving arising from the Benefit Fraud Hotline has been since its establishment. [75849]

Mr. Timms: Administration of the Benefit Fraud hotline is the responsibility of Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Iain Duncan Smith, dated 12 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the number of prosecutions which have followed from calls made to the Benefit Fraud Hotline in each month since May 1997; and what the total annual saving arising form the Benefit Fraud Hotline has been since its establishment.

Investigations by the Benefits Agency, which include cases which start as a Hotline referrals, have led to 8,417 prosecutions in the year to date (to the end of January 1999.) Figures for referrals, in each month since May 1997 are provided in the attached table. Figures for the number of these referrals that then result in prosecutions have only been recorded since January 1999.

The total Weekly Benefit Savings achieved by the National Benefit Fraud Hotline since its launch in August 1996 to date (to end of January 1999) is £108.9m.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what definitions of high and low suspicion of fraud are used for categorising cases in the Area Benefit Review Programme. [76108]

Mr. Timms: The administration of the Area Benefit Review Programme is the responsibility of Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my right hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Frank Field, dated 12 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the definitions of high and low suspicion of fraud used for categorising cases in the Area Benefit Review Programme.

The definitions of high and low suspicion are set out in the Governmental Statistical Service Area Benefit Review Results published in November 1998 and you may wish to refer to this document. The published headline figures of fraud and error exclude high and low suspicion of fraud. We are following up specific cases so that those originally classified as high suspicion of fraud can be subsequently confirmed as fraud, re-classified as correct, or remain as high suspicion.

As part of our commitment to improve the administration of the benefit system we have been working to clarify the definitions as published in the above report. The revised definitions are set out below.

Low suspicion of fraud means that the reviewing officer suspects that fraud exists, but the evidence is weak, and benefit entitlement does not change. For example, a customer with a long-term claim appears to be living above their means, but there are no solid grounds for suspicion, and no means of establishing the source of the financing.

High suspicion of fraud means that, on the balance of probabilities, a fraudulent situation exists, but there is insufficient information to prove fraud, and benefit entitlement does not change.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Benefit Interviews

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 2 March 1999, Official Report, column 709, on benefit interviews, whether a claimant will be able to provide the completed claim form by post or by another person delivering it to the relevant agency. [75851]

Angela Eagle: Claim forms delivered by post or by another person will be accepted where the claimant's readiness for work has been reviewed and a decision taken as to whether an immediate work-focused interview is appropriate. If not, we will take steps to contact the claimant to resolve these issues before benefit is put into payment.

Family Resources Survey

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the special analyses, including unpublished tabulations, of the Family Resources Survey which were undertaken by his Department for the Pension Provision Group. [76098]

Mr. Timms: The following analyses of the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey were undertaken for the Pension Provision Group:

Tabulation of the individual incomes of men and women over State pension age.

Tabulation of the incomes of single pensioners.

Tabulation of the average incomes of pensioner units by source and by marital status and gender.

Tabulation of the average incomes of pensioner units by source and by marital status and age under/over 75.

Estimation of the number of benefit units becoming entitled to means-tested benefits were upper capital limits to be removed and tariff income calculated for all capital above the lower capital limit.

Estimations of the numbers of people below State pension age in paid employment in the UK who are currently contributing to SERPS and occupational pension schemes and who have ever contributed to a personal pension scheme, by gender and full-time or part-time employment status.

Bereavement Benefits

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the average age of those ceasing to receive widowed mother's allowance on the grounds that they no longer have dependent children. [76112]

Angela Eagle: The average age of those ceasing to receive Widowed Mother's Allowance between September 1997 and September 1998 is 51.

Notes:

1. Average age calculated of widows who were in receipt of Widowed Mothers Allowance (WMA) and had a dependent child in September 1997, but by September 1998 were in receipt of Widows Benefit (WB) but no longer had a qualifying dependent child.

2. The average does not include WMA cases that move off WB completely as it may be reasons other than no longer having a dependent child/ren.

3. Excludes Northern Ireland.

State Second Pension

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) which versions of the state second pension, and what assumptions about the dates of take-up, underlie the table on page 105 of the White Paper, Partnership in Pensions (Cm 4179); [76110]

(2) which versions of the state second pension, taken up at what dates, underlie Chart 5 on page 41 of the White Paper, Partnership in Pensions (Cm 4179). [76136]

Mr. Timms: Both Chart 5 on page 41 and the examples given in the table on page 105 of the Green Paper "A new contract for welfare: Partnership in Pensions" are based on the first stage of the proposed State Second Pension. An implementation date of April 2002 was assumed.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what variation there will be between men and women as regards the benefits of the current SERPS and proposed state second pension system set out in the table on page 105 of the White Paper, Partnership in Pensions (Cm 4179). [76109]

Mr. Timms: The examples of pension provision shown on page 105 of the Green Paper "A new contract for welfare: Partnership in Pensions" apply equally to men and women.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out the qualifying conditions in terms of income and other factors for availability of the state second pension (a) to 2002, (b) from 2002 to 2007 and (c) after 2007. [76748]

Mr. Timms: No one will qualify for the State Second Pension prior to April 2002, as this is the proposed implementation date. The qualifying conditions for the first stage of the State Second Pension are set out in Chapter 6 of the Green Paper "A new contract for welfare: Partnership in Pensions". The introduction of the second stage of the State Second Pension is dependent on stakeholder pensions becoming established as low-cost, value-for money, funded second pensions. It is expected that, once the second stage is implemented, the qualifying conditions will remain the same.

Pensioners

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate, on the basis of the 1988–89 and 1994 retirement surveys, the proportion of pensioners whose real incomes decline in the five years after reaching state pension age. [76101]

Mr. Timms: This Department does not hold retirement survey data in a format that would allow the information to be produced. The Department commissioned the Institute for Fiscal Studies (IFS) and the Age Concern Institute of Gerontology (ACIOG) to carry out the analysis of the combined 1988–89 and 1994 data. Findings were published in "The Dynamics of Retirement" (1998) DSS Research Report No. 72, The Stationery Office. Converting the data to an appropriate format and producing a reliable analysis would involve disproportionate cost.

Brit Awards

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those Ministers in his Department who were present at the recent Brit awards in an official capacity, indicating the organisation acting as their sponsor or host. [76653]

Mr. Timms: None of this Department's Ministers attended the Brit awards.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently in receipt of Invalid Care Allowance; and what proportion of carers this represents. [76450]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Invalid Care Allowance is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, Peter Mathison. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. David Rendel, dated 12 March 1999:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people are currently in receipt of Invalid Care Allowance; and what proportion of carers this represents.

Invalid Care Allowance (ICA) is a benefit for people of working age who are regularly caring for a severely disabled person for at least 35 hours a week. As at 10 March 1999 374,241 people were in receipt of the allowance.

Unfortunately, information about numbers of recipients as a proportion of carers who fulfil the ICA eligibility conditions is not available.

I am sorry I could not, on this occasion, be more helpful.

Pension Case

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects the Benefits Agency to begin payment of the retirement pension due to the constituent of the hon. Member for Aylesbury (reference ZW755428A); and if he will make a statement. [76467]

Mr. Timms: The administration of Retirement Pension is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. David Lidington, dated 12 March 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking when he expects the Benefits Agency to begin payment of Retirement Pension to your constituent who lives in Aylesbury.

In this case your constituent elected to have their Retirement Pension paid four-weekly by Automated Credit Transfer. The first payment was released timeously to their bank account on 26 February 1999. They were advised of this on the same day.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Disability Living Allowance

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will define the broad-based mechanism to check awards of disability living allowance under the new periodic review system referred to in his letter to hon. Members of 28 January. [76765]

Mr. Bayley: We are determined to ensure that people are receiving the correct amount of benefit. From April 1999, a new fairer system of periodic inquiry into benefit entitlement will commence for existing recipients of Disability Living Allowance (DLA). The process will incorporate lessons already learned and will be evaluated and refined as it develops.

Initially, cases will be selected for inquiry action on a proportional basis across the range of awards to be included. People selected for inquiry action will be asked to complete a detailed questionnaire, based on the current claim form for DLA, either by post or at a home visit. These two methods of approach will be applied evenly across the range of people selected to help identify the best means of approach in individual cases. Once completed, the inquiry form will provide the Benefits Agency (BA) with an up to date picture of the need that the individual has for help with personal care and mobility and allow the BA to determine whether a review of entitlement would be appropriate. This will enable awards to be increased or decreased in line with entitlement. All staff involved in the new processes will receive full training before commencing this new work. The inquiry action will be monitored and evaluated after six months of operation and the findings will be used to continue to improve the process.

Initially, the new system will exclude DLA recipients whose cases were examined by the Benefit Integrity Project (BIP) and those groups of disabled people that were specifically excluded from the action of the BIP. People who are terminally ill and meet the criteria set out in Section 66(2)(a) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 and people with a fixed period award due to end within the next three years will also not be contacted. Full details are set out at in my Written Answer to the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) on 10 March 1999, Official Report, columns 251–52.

Some disabling conditions, and the needs that they generate, change very little over time whilst ôthers can be very variable in effect and/or degenerative in nature. The BA is therefore working to establish the proper frequency with which individuals should be asked about their current needs, so that, in the future, inquiries can be made at the most appropriate time and new claimants can be advised from the outset when inquiries are likely to be made in their case. This action does not affect the responsibility of all claimants to tell the BA about changes that may affect benefit entitlement.

Wind Chill Factor

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has had with the Meteorological Office concerning its proposals to pilot a study of weather stations in Scotland to take account of the wind chill factor in the assessment of cold weather payments; how much such a scheme would cost; and what plans he has to initiate such a scheme. [76146]

Angela Eagle: No discussions have taken place with the Meteorological Office on such a pilot. Nor is it possible to estimate the cost of introducing into the current scheme an allowance for the effects of wind speed because no trigger criterion exists combining it with external air temperature.

A number of formulae are used to calculate the combined effects of air temperature and wind speed on the human body when in the open air (commonly referred to as "windchill"). However, the Building Research Establishment advises that these are not appropriate when assessing heat loss from buildings, because different heat transfer mechanisms apply.

We are committed to tackling the problems associated with vulnerable people keeping warm and have already introduced numerous substantial measures to meet this objective. The most recent ones were announced in the Budget and will provide extra help for pensioners and young children in low income families. They include increasing the level of Winter Fuel Payments for pensioner households to £100 from next Winter--and a substantial increase in the rates of benefit payable in income-related benefits for children under the age of eleven. The Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill proposals will also provide extra help for those in greatest need who have a long-term illness or are disabled.

Taking into account all the measures already introduced we do not believe that amending the Cold Weather Payment scheme would be the most effective way to get help to those who need it most.

NIRS2

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on current progress on the introduction of the new National Insurance Recording System (NIRS2). [77192]

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Social Security, in his written answer on 18 January 1999, Official Report, columns 368–70, updated the House about progress that the Contributions Agency had made in addressing outstanding issues relating to the introduction of the new National Insurance Recording System (NIRS2). These issues include recording 1997–98 National Insurance Contributions, links between the NIRS2 system and claims for benefit, and wider roll-out of NIRS2 functionality.

Since January the Contributions Agency has worked closely with Andersen Consulting to address these issues. Details of the progress that has been made are set out. Where issues have not yet been fully resolved, the Contributions and Benefits Agencies have endeavoured to minimise their impact on individuals and action is being put in place to identify the best way forward.

In the light of outstanding issues relating to the introduction of NIRS2, it has been necessary to review the Contributions and Benefits Agencies' objectives for the remainder of the year and to re-prioritise activity. To ensure that we receive the greatest benefit from the system capacity, I have decided that the recording of 1997–98 National Insurance Contributions and payment of age-related rebates should be the first priorities. This will minimise the disruption to individuals and ensure that payments to individuals' personal pensions are made. However, a consequence of this decision is that some system backlogs will not be cleared until into the next financial year.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State reported that, at 11 January, 31 million National Insurance contributions for the tax year 1997–98 had been posted. At 14 March 1999, 39 million items had been posted for the year, with 5.8 million items still to be posted. Action is underway to clear these outstanding items swiftly.

The cumulative total of age-related rebate payments paid to occupational and personal pension schemes in respect of individual scheme members in this financial year has increased from £1,411 million on 4 January 1999 to £1,882 million on 1 March. This is over 75 per cent. of the expected net total for the year. (The cumulative total figure includes a compensation element.) Action is underway to clear the outstanding backlog.

The NIRS2 link to Retirement Pensions, Widows Benefit, Jobseeker's Allowance and Incapacity Benefit is being used to process new claims to benefit. Where 1997–98 contributions are not yet recorded, there is a continuing need to make initial awards of Retirement Pension and emergency payments to widows. Initial and emergency awards of National Insurance benefits made since April 1998 will be reviewed following completion of the recording of 1997–98 National Insurance contribution information. The Benefits Agency hopes to begin reviewing these claims from April 1999.

The Benefits Agency continues to calculate entitlement to State Earnings Related Pensions clerically for people who request this. 5,703 such calculations had been completed at 15 March.

By 8 February 1999 a cumulative total of over £415 million of self-employed and voluntary National Insurance contributions had been billed and/or collected through the monthly payment method. In addition, over £286 million had been billed through the quarterly payment method.

New registration facilities for self-employed people who want to pay their contributions by monthly Direct Debit or by quarterly bills are fully operational.

Adult registrations continue to be processed using the NIRS2 on-line facility and plastic National Insurance Number (NINO) cards are being issued. The exercise to process Scottish Juvenile registrations is complete. The full Juvenile Registration facilities were made available on 10 March 1999.

All the work involved is being taken forward through a coordinated plan agreed between the Agencies involved. In order to minimise the impact on customers, we have set up a Benefits Agency taskforce that will take on responsibility for benefit claims affected by the delays. This will give customers a single point of contact by both telephone and post. The taskforce can be contacted, at local call rates, on 08456 010586 between 08.30 and 16.30 Monday to Friday, or customers can write to the taskforce at PO Box 6, Newcastle Upon Tyne, NE98 1XB.

Ministers will keep the House informed of progress.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Early Years Development

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) when he plans to announce approval of the local education authority early years development and childcare plans which were submitted to him last month; [76295]

(2) if he plans to approve all local education authority early years development and childcare plans on the basis of a three tier approval system; and if he will set out those tiers and the criteria used to judge the plans at each level. [76294]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 12 March 1999]: There will be three levels of decision: full approval, conditional approval and deferred approval. Full approval will be awarded to plans which broadly meet the criteria set out in Section three of the 'Early Years Development and Childcare Partnership Planning Guidance for 1999–2000.' For plans which meet most of the planning guidance but have some gaps in information, approval will be conditional on the subsequent submission of material to fill the gaps. Where plans do not show that the statutory duty to provide nursery education places for four year olds will be met, where there is clear evidence of a failure in partnership working or where the plan falls well short of meeting the criteria in the planning guidance, approval will be deferred until an acceptable plan is submitted.

I hope to make an announcement by the end of the month.

SATS (Level 6)

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many primary school pupils in England were entered for the level 6 SATS papers in 1998 in (a) English, (b) mathematics and (c) science; how many were awarded level 6 in each subject; and what are the comparative figures for (i) 1994, (ii) 1995, (iii) 1996 and (iv) 1997. [75550]

Ms Estelle Morris: The available information is given in the following table:

Level 6 national curriculum test paper—key stage 2

	Number of pupils entered			Number of pupils achieving level 6
	1998	1997	1996	1998	1997	1996	1995
English	21,689	26,538	34,409	59	484	1,021	192
Mathematics	21,002	23,466	24,492	1,013	837	434	1,545
Science	8,687	8,760	8,076	223	380	122	392

Note:
Information on the number of pupils entered for 1995 is not available, as data were not collected centrally at pupil level

EU Education Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish the agenda for the forthcoming EU Education Council on 18 March. [77157]

Mr. Mudie: The Education Council provisionally scheduled for 18 March has been cancelled.

Target 2000

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress made in introducing the Target 2000 programme of education and training for young people. [76457]

Mr. Mudie: Our manifesto commitment to get all young people on the road to a Level 2 qualification by the year 2000 is being taken forward by our Investing in Young People strategy. A key component of the strategy is the expansion of National Traineeships, as part of the reform of Youth Training. 28,000 people have now started National Traineeships, which build on the success of Modern Apprenticeships and are available in 46 sectors of industry and commerce. A target of 100,000 starts has been set for March 2000.

The strategy is wide ranging and includes piloting of an Education Maintenance Allowance in 12 areas, refocusing of the Careers Service on those most in need, expansion of the New Start strategy, and implementation of the Right to Time for Study legislation.

We expect to develop the strategy further in the light of the forthcoming Social Exclusion Unit report into young people not in education, employment or training.

Nursery Voucher Scheme

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the savings resulting from the abolition of the nursery voucher scheme. [74785]

Ms Hodge: The nursery education voucher scheme was replaced in September 1997 by local Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships and Plans which, from September 1998, have guaranteed a free, part-time early education place for all four year olds, for the three terms before compulsory school age, for those parents who want one in the maintained, private or voluntary sectors. The savings which accrued have been allocated to fund the establishment of a pilot scheme of 25 Early Excellence Centres by 2001, of which 17 have already been announced. From September 1999, additional funding will be provided to expand early education places for three year olds.

Special Educational Needs

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to publish the outcome of the current consultation exercise on special educational needs; how many responses he has received to that consultation exercise; and if he will publish those responses. [76764]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department expects to issue a first draft of a revised Code of Practice on the identification and assessment of special educational needs in the Autumn. There have been over 600 responses to the consultation document issued on 12 January 1999. Under the Code of Practice on Open Government, any responses to the consultation document will be made public on request unless respondents have indicated that they wished their responses to remain confidential.

Environment Taskforce

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many under-25s have been placed with the environment taskforce since its inception; what work the taskforce has carried out; and if he will make a statement. [76439]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of these questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Foster to Mr. David Maclean, dated 15 March 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked Leigh Lewis to reply to your question about the number of young people who have participated in the Environment Task Force option of New Deal for 18–24 year olds and what type of work is carried out on it. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to Mr. Lewis as Chief Executive of the Agency. I am replying in his absence.

Up to the end of January, 8,910 young people had started on the Environment Task Force option of the New Deal for 18–24 year olds. This figure is drawn from the latest Government Statistical Service figures to the end of December 1998 and provisional Management Information to the end of January 1999.

Turning to the type of work carried out, there is a wide range of projects which contribute to conserving energy and water and protecting the environment. We have also been keen to offer opportunities that encourage young people to become involved in local community regeneration. Projects have included dealing with housing, forest and park management, and reclamation of derelict or waste land. All projects are assessed against environmental objectives set by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. The key criterion, however, is the extent to which they will develop participants' skills, help them into jobs at the end of their time on the option and increase their long term employability.

I hope this is helpful.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Brit Awards

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list those Ministers in his Department who were present at the recent Brit awards in an official capacity, indicating the organisation acting as their sponsor or host. [76650]

Mr. Heon: None.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Race Relations Act 1976

18. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to implement his proposals to extend the Race Relations Act 1976 to all public services. [74594]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced in his Statement to the House on 24 February 1999, Official Report, columns 389–403, on the report of the inquiry into the death of Stephen Lawrence, that the Government accepted the recommendation in Sir William Macpherson's report that the police service should be brought within the Race Relations Act 1976. My right hon. Friend also announced that we intend going further by extending the Act to cover all the public services and that we are developing proposals to that end.

The intention of the Home Secretary is to do so as quickly as possible. Parliamentary time is, of course, limited and the final decision belongs to the Leader of the House.

Criminal Investigations

19. Mr. Beard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review police methods and practices in gathering and interpreting information in the course of an inquiry. [74595]

Kate Hoey: Work is already underway in the Police Service to establish performance standards for the investigation of crime, to be followed and monitored in all forces. The Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) has developed a manual of standards for murder investigations and their Crime Committee is developing models of good practice for all areas of crime investigation.

Domestic Burglars (Sentences)

21. Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure severe punishments for those domestic burglars who are convicted for a third time. [74597]

Mr. Boateng: As we announced on 12 January 1999, Official Report, column 159, we intend to bring into force this December section 4 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997. This provides minimum sentences of three years for those convicted for the third time of an offence of domestic burglary.

Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report

22. Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which of his Department's Ministers and officials saw the Macpherson report between 15 and 23 February; for what purpose; and if he will make a statement. [74598]

Mr. Straw: Details of this kind will need to be established by the independent investigator appointed to investigate the leak of parts of the Macpherson Report. It would not be appropriate for me to comment further at this stage .

28. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the Macpherson inquiry report into the death of Stephen Lawrence. [74604]

Mr. Boateng: The report into the death of Stephen Lawrence was published on 24 February 1999. The Home Secretary made an oral statement on that day, Official Report, columns 389–403, and said that he will be publishing an action plan detailing how the Government intend to take forward the recommendations and that there will be a full day's debate on this in due course.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is (a) the name of the independent investigator into the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry leak and (b) who is his reporting officer for day-to-day Civil Service work. [76191]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The investigator is independent; the question of a reporting officer does not, therefore, arise. It is not the practice to give details of investigators.

Social Exclusion

23. Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the role of the voluntary sector in tackling social exclusion. [74599]

Mr. Boateng: The Government fully recognise the essential role that the voluntary and community sector plays in tackling social exclusion. Many organisations from the sector have unique experience and knowledge of areas of need and opportunity. The Policy Action Teams established to take this work forward include representatives from a range of voluntary organisations.

Witness Protection

24. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the policy on the financing of witness protection; and if he will make a statement. [74600]

Mr. Boateng: Formal witness protection arrangements are funded from within existing budgets of individual police forces and, as such, are a matter left to the discretion of Chief Police Officers.

I have no plans to review these arrangements.

Police (Young People)

25. Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) guidance and (b) training is offered to police forces on the policing of young people. [R] [74601]

Kate Hoey: The Home Office has issued guidance, in conjunction with the DfEE, to both police forces and local educational authorities on the application of the truancy provisions of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. The National Operations Faculty at the Police Staff College, Bramshill, provides training for officers who manage the police input to Youth Offending Teams. The Faculty has recently established a database for use by forces on information relating to the policing of young people with a view to disseminating good policing practice. Individual forces may also provide other training to meet local needs.

Family Support

26. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on supporting families. [74602]

Mr. Boateng: The Government's family policy is set out in the consultation document Supporting Families. The consultation period ends today (Monday 15 March). Work to assess the responses to the consultation exercise is already in hand, and the Ministerial Group on the Family will use the responses to inform the development of its strategy to increase the support available to families.

Police Complaints

27. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times since May 1997 a complaint against a police force has been externally investigated. [74603]

Mr. Boateng: 15 complaints cases were recorded as having been referred to another force for investigation in England and Wales in 1997–98, the latest year for which figures are available. Each case may consist of one or more complaint. This figure does not include investigations involving allegations of criminal or disciplinary offences in which no complaint has been received from a member of the public.

The Government support the recommendation of the Home Affairs Select Committee in its report on police disciplinary and complaints procedures that investigation by an outside force should become a more regular occurrence than it is at present. The new guidance which we will be issuing shortly on police discipline and complaints procedures will encourage chief officers to make greater use of investigating officers from outside forces.

Crime Audits

29. Ms Beverley Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the crime audits completed to date by local partnerships. [74605]

Mr. Boateng: The audits are a necessary and important step in the formulation of the local crime and disorder reduction strategies—which have to be completed by 1 April 1999. I am encouraged by the commitment I see on the part of the local partnerships to completing the tasks set for them in a timely and effective way.

Criminal Records (Children)

30. Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the availability of criminal records of children looked after by one local authority and placed in another local authority area to the local police in that area. [74606]

Mr. Boateng: Details of the criminal records of individuals who come to police notice can be accessed by the police directly from the national criminal records database on the Police National Computer or from local police records.

Asylum Seekers

31. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost of current provision of benefits in kind to asylum seekers. [74607]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The cost of the current provision of benefits in kind to asylum seekers will not be known until after the current financial year. However, we believe that the unit costs which have been set for 1998–99, whilst challenging, are realistic. The unit costs are:

£165 per week for single adults;

£230 per week for families (or £240 per week for families already resident within Inner London);

£400 for unaccompanied children aged 15 and under; and

£200 for unaccompanied 16 and 17 year olds.

37. Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people claimed asylum in the United Kingdom during 1998. [74613]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Forty six thousand and fifteen claimed asylum in 1998.

Animal Procedures Committee

32. Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met members of the Animal Procedures Committee to discuss progress in reducing the numbers of experiments on animals. [74608]

Mr. George Howarth: I met with members of the Committee on 9 December 1998. We discussed a number of issues including the need to ensure that animals are used only where fully justified: where the benefits outweigh the costs and where there are no alternatives. I would, however, refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 11 May 1998, Official Report, column 51—the effectiveness of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 cannot be judged by the overall number of procedures.

Airguns

33. Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the current legislation controlling airguns. [74609]

Mr. Boateng: We have no immediate plans to change the law relating to air weapons, but the firearms legislation will be kept under close scrutiny to see if there is anything further which needs to be done to protect the public safety.

Special Constables

34. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the recruitment of special constables; and if he will make a statement. [74610]

Kate Hoey: No representations have been received in respect of the recruitment of special constables.

The government fully support the efforts of police forces to recruit more special constables who bring a level of commitment and local knowledge which is invaluable in policing their own communities.

Illegal Immigrants

35. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the road transport industry over his plans to levy financial penalties on lorry drivers found guilty of transporting illegal immigrants. [74611]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have held a number of meetings with representatives of the Freight Transport Association and the Road Haulage Association, on the proposed penalty prior to the Bill's publication. I will continue to work closely with the industry on the detailed operation of this new penalty.

Police Vehicles (Accidents)

38. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been (a) injured or (b) killed since 1990 as a result of an accident involving a police vehicle answering a 999 call. [74614]

Mr. Boateng: Figures dealing solely with responses to emergency calls are not available centrally as statistics collate them together with accidents arising from pursuits. Information has been provided by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary, to whom forces submit statistical returns. Collection arrangements have changed over the period so figures for 1990 to 1993 cover only serious injuries.

Police vehicle accidents arising from responses to immediate calls and pursuits, England and Wales

	Injuries	Fatalities
1990	317	24
1991	271	32
1992	300	30
1993	300	34
1994–95	[1]1,830	[1]21
1995–96	[2]2,169	[2]21
1996–97	[2]1,930	[2]15
1997–98	2,123	15

[1] Figures from 3 forces are missing from the total
[2] Figures from 2 forces are missing from the total

Police Officers (Ethnic Communities)

39. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to encourage the promotion of police officers from the ethnic communities to senior rank. [74615]

Kate Hoey: Individual targets will be set for each force for the recruitment, retention and progression of ethnic minority officers. We believe that targets coupled with a range of initiatives aimed at removing barriers to progression will inevitably lead over time to more ethnic minority officers in senior ranks.

Animal Experiments

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the reduction in the number of experiments following the ban on the testing on animals of cosmetic experiments and ingredients. [74592]

Mr. George Howarth: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey), on 15 February 1999, Official Report, column 598: an average of about 2,000 animals a year were used in cosmetics testing from 1995 to 1997.

Closed Circuit Television

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he gives to people installing closed circuit television about issues of privacy, retention of recordings and the need to follow a published code of practice. [74596]

Mr. Boateng: A code of practice for Closed Circuit Television (CCTV) systems is essential to ensure that CCTV is operated with integrity and respect for personal privacy. Public space CCTV systems funded under the Home Office Challenge Competition should comply with the best practice code developed by the Local Government Information Unit.

The Data Protection Act 1998 will provide a framework for the statutory regulation of CCTV systems.

The Data Protection Registrar has started to develop a code of practice, to be issued under her new powers as Data Protection Commissioner. This code will provide guidance to CCTV operators on how to comply with the Act's requirements.

Sex Offender Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many sex offender orders have been (a) applied for and (b) granted under section 2 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. [76023]

Mr. Boateng: To date, we are aware of one Sex Offender Order having been granted. No information is held centrally to indicate the number of Sex Offender Orders which have been applied for.

Police (False Information)

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were charged with wasting police time, other than by making malicious complaints against the police, in each constabulary area in England and Wales during each year from 1996 to 1998. [75904]

Mr. Boateng: There is no offence of making a malicious complaint against the police, but a person may commit an offence under section 5(2) of the Criminal Law

Act 1967 where he or she causes wasteful employment of the police by giving false information to them. Information is available centrally only on the number of people cautioned, prosecuted or convicted for an offence under section 5(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967.

In 1996 in England and Wales, there were 134 cautions, 60 prosecutions and 44 convictions for an offence under section 5(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967. In 1997, there were 95 cautions, 71 prosecutions, and 56 convictions for the same offence.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of man/days identified as having been spent in the investigation of (a) malicious complaints and (b) false information within each constabulary area in England and Wales during each year from 1996 to 1998. [75903]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is not recorded centrally.

Electoral Registers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many councils did not have the 1999–2000 electoral register available in (a) printed and (b) tape or disc form on 16 February; and what requirements there are for councils to make registers available by that date. [76626]

Mr. George Howarth: Information on the availability of the new electoral register for each local council area is not held centrally.

Under the Representation of the People Act 1983, electoral registration officers are required to publish the register not later than 15 February in any year. If any part of a register is not published by this date then, until the day after it is published, the corresponding part of the previous register continues in use. Once published, printed copies are required to be made available to electoral users on request, whilst data copies are to be supplied on payment of the appropriate fee.

Police (South Cumbria)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations have been made to him concerning (i) the number of police stations and police officers and (ii) police resources in South Cumbria by (a) members of the police and (b) hon. Members. [76665]

Mr. Boateng: I have not received any representations specifically about the number of police stations, officers or police resources in South Cumbria. I did, however, receive two representations from hon. Members, one representation from the Cumbria Police Authority and one representation from the Allerdale Borough Council about the police funding allocation for the Cumbria Police Authority in 1999–2000. Only the letter from the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale referred to the number of police stations and police officers.

I also had a meeting with representatives of the Cumbria Police Authority and the Chief Constable on 6 January about the funding settlement for 1999–2000 at which the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale was present.

I understand that the Cumbria Police Authority have approved a budget increase of 2.7 per cent. for 1999–2000.

Prisons (Phones)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are (a) the costs, (b) the purposes and (c) the timescale of the contract awarded to BT for new technology phones in prisons; and if he will make a statement. [76664]

Mr. George Howarth: The new prisoner telephone system, which is due to be installed in all prisons in England and Wales by May 2000, has the dual purpose of enabling prisoners to maintain their family ties whilst minimising the risk of misuse. The new system is being provided and maintained at no cost to the Prison Service throughout the duration of the ten-year contract.

WPC Yvonne Fletcher

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive the report from the Metropolitan Police on the review of the evidence surrounding the murder of WPC Fletcher. [74874]

Mr. Boateng: The police review of the evidence surrounding the murder of WPC Yvonne Fletcher has taken longer than originally anticipated. I understand from the Metropolitan police, however, that this review will be completed in the near future.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Walsall, North of 10 February concerning a constituent. [76227]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 12 March 1999]: I have written today on the Home Secretary's behalf to my hon. Friend for Walsall, North.

European Parliamentary Elections

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on (a) the counting arrangements and (b) the procedures to be adopted in the event of a recount in the elections for the European Parliament, in relation to counting at (i) parliamentary constituency level and (ii) regional centre level. [77127]

Mr. George Howarth: Details of the proposed counting arrangements for European Parliamentary elections were set out in the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) on 8 March 1999, Official Report, column 33.

Parties and candidates will be entitled to be present at all of the local counts and to ask for a recount. They will also be entitled to be present at the place where the regional returning officer performs the seat allocation calculation and to ask him to repeat the calculation.

Criminal Justice Act 1993

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will implement the measures contained in Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1993. [76292]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 12 March 1999]: Discussions are currently taking place with Departments most closely interested in the implementation of Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1993. It is hoped that we will be in a position to bring Part I into force very soon.

Justice and Home Affairs Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 12 March, indicating the position taken by the UK Government on each item discussed. [76200]

Mr. Straw: I will report to the House as soon as possible on the outcome of this Council.

Police (Oxfordshire)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were in Oxfordshire in (a) March 1997, (b) March 1998 and (c) March 1999; and how many he estimates there will be in March 2000. [76785]

Mr. Boateng: I understand from the Chief Constable that it is not possible to provide information on the number of police officers in Oxfordshire as the territorial divisions of the Thames Valley Police are not co-terminous with the county boundaries of the three counties that make up the force area.

Information on the number of officers for March 1999 will not be available before the middle of May. Ministers have no direct control over police numbers. Under legislation passed by the previous Government in 1994, it is for the individual chief constables to determine the number of police officers in their force, on the basis of the resources made available to them. It is not, therefore, possible to provide a projection of the force's strength for March 2000.

Numbers of officers in the Thames Valley Police in 1997 and 1998 are set out in the table:

Thames Valley Police

Year	Number of officers[1]
31 March 1997	3,695
31 March 1998	3,776

Public Safety Radio Communications Project

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated (a) initial capital cost and (b) annual running cost of the Public Safety Radio Communications Project in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [75701]

Mr. Boateng: The Public Safety Radio Communications Project (PSRCP) is to be delivered as a Private Finance Initiative scheme. British Telecom will be the service provider and, therefore, responsible for the capital infrastructure costs.

I am advised by Police Information Technology Organisation that negotiations for the award of the contract for PSRCP are now entering their final stage. I am, therefore, not able to comment on annual running costs as they are part of the contract negotiations.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what form of competition took place prior to negotiations starting on the introduction of the Public Safety Radio Communications Project; and what other parties took an interest in providing the communications services required by the Police. [75703]

Mr. Boateng: A full competition was held under European Community rules and three consortia were invited to submit a bid. The Project Definition Study was awarded to Quadrant—a consortium led by British Telecom after the two other consortia withdrew from the competition.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contingency plans have been prepared for an alternative to the Public Safety Radio Communications Project. [75702]

Mr. Boateng: A fallback strategy has been produced and is being further developed to assist forces to procure replacement radio systems, either locally or regionally.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans there are for other emergency services to be included in negotiations on the introduction of the Public Safety Radio Communications Project. [75704]

Mr. Boateng: The Police Information Technology Organisation are negotiating with British Telecom about the introduction of the Public Safety Radio Communications service for the police. They are keeping potential sharers of the service informed of developments.

District Plans (Police Authority Objections)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what statutory authority police authorities may object to local authorities' unitary district plan proposals; and if he will list the occasions on which this has occurred in each of the last five years. [75939]

Mr. Raynsford: I have been asked to reply.

Police authorities, like any other individual, body or organisation, can object to a unitary development plan during the statutory periods set out in the Town and Country Planning (Development Plans) Regulations 1991. Information on organisations making objections is not collected centrally.

2001 Census

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received calling for the inclusion of additional categories in the 2001 census to identify (a) race and (b) ethnic origin. [74630]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

The Office for National Statistics, along with the other two UK Census Offices, has conducted a lengthy programme of consultation with all user communities on their requirements for questions to be considered in the 2001 Census. This consultation process culminated in the submission by users of business cases setting out the uses and values of Census information for each particular topic. Ministers have now considered the case for a revised ethnic group question in the 2001 Census, and the Government's proposals were published in a White Paper on 4 March [Cm 4253].

During the period of consultation, a total of 154 representations calling for the inclusion of additional categories in the 2001 Census to identify ethnic origin have been received as follows:

108 from MPs and 31 from MEPs, on behalf of the British Sikh Federation, the Kashmiri Workers Association, the Federation of Irish Societies, Cornwall 2000, Cornish Solidarity and 15 from individual members of the public.

Live Animal Imports

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there were for breaches of the law in respect of live animal imports for each year from 1990 to the latest year for which figures are available. [75846]

Mr. Rooker: I have been asked to reply.

Statistics concerning the number of prosecutions for breach of the law in respect of live animal imports are as follows:

Number of prosecutions for breaches of the law in respect of live animal imports into Great Britain

Year	Number
1990	60
1991	99
1992	73
1993	58

DEFENCE

Gulf War Veterans

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many Gulf War veterans have died since the end of the war in 1991; [62958]

(2) how many service personnel who served in the Gulf War of 1991 have died whilst still serving in HM forces. [62960]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 9 December 1998]: The Ministry of Defence has identified 53,462 members of the UK armed forces who were deployed on Operation GRANBY or to a state in the Gulf region at some time between 1 September 1990 and 30 June 1991. As at 5 March 1999, 381 of these individuals were recorded by the MOD as having died since 1 April 1991, of which 254 were regular personnel recorded as having died whilst still serving in the armed forces. Information received by the MOD in respect of a further 17 Gulf veterans who have been reported as having died is currently in the process of being verified.

Territorial Army

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made of the cost of moving a non-infantry TA battalion HQ from South to North Wales. [68478]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 1 February 1999]: No assessment has been made of the cost of transferring a non-infantry TA Regimental Headquarters from South to North Wales. There are no non-infantry TA Battalion Headquarters in the South of Wales.

Compensation

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to publish a consultation document following the review of arrangements for compensating service personnel and their dependants injured or killed during service. [72250]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 22 February 1999]: The joint MOD/DSS review of compensation arrangements for service personnel has proved more complicated than expected and therefore taken longer than we originally planned. We are, however, pressing ahead with the work and we hope to publish a consultation document around the middle of the year.

Defence Agencies (Targets)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to set targets for the (a) Army Training and Recruiting Agency, (b) Defence Bills Agency, (c) Defence Evaluation and Research Agency and (d) Army Base Repair Organisation for the year 1999–2000. [71943]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 25 February 1999]: We expect to set Key Targets for these four agencies by the end of April 1999.

Air Miles

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many air miles have been earned by him and each of his ministers; and how he proposes to use them. [73332]

Mr. Spellar: The Government's policy on the use and disposal of air miles was set out by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 12 January 1999, Official Report, column 141.

Detailed information on any air miles earned by Ministers as a result of official travel is not recorded centrally.

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what continuing research is in progress on depleted uranium under the medical assessment programme; [74718]

(2) for what reason testing for depleted uranium has been omitted from the overt list of standard tests carried out at the medical assessment programme; [74717]

(3) what tests for depleted uranium have been undertaken under the medical assessment programme; and what consent for such testing was sought from those tested. [74719]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The primary purpose of the Gulf veterans' Medical Assessment Programme (MAP) is to investigate the medical complaints of UK Gulf War veterans and, so far as possible, to diagnose what they are suffering from and recommend appropriate treatment, or provide reassurance if no illness is found.

When the MAP was first established in 1993, its first Head, Wing Commander (now Group Captain) Bill Coker, initially carried out those tests he felt necessary on clinical grounds to establish a diagnosis. When the number of patients referred to the MAP increased, he carried out a number of screening tests, similar to those then used by the US Department of Defense's Comprehensive Clinical Evaluation Programme (CCEP), which is broadly equivalent to the MAP. These screening tests did not include a test to detect the presence of uranium because Group Captain Coker had not previously seen any features in patients to indicate that such testing was clinically necessary. The US experience had suggested that the urinary excretion of uranium was only significantly increased in those veterans with retained fragments of depleted uranium (DU). As MOD was not aware of any UK Service personnel who had sustained shrapnel injuries from DU-based ammunition, it was not thought necessary to screen routinely for uranium excretion, although testing could be carried out on a case by case basis if clinically indicated. Any other tests considered clinically appropriate would also be performed, these additional tests varying from patient to patient. This system of investigation was in place at the time of the Royal College of Physicians' (RCP) clinical audit in 1995.

The RCP's subsequent report, published in July 1995, endorsed the MAP's professional independence and integrity and made specific comments on how the Programme could be improved. However, with the exception of a recommendation concerning psychiatric assessments, the RCP did not recommend any changes to the tests and examinations carried out by the MAP.

The baseline tests currently carried out on MAP patients by St. Thomas's Hospital on the MAP's behalf are very similar to those which were in place at the time of the RCP audit in 1995. They are as follows:

Full blood count and sedimentation rate (FBC/ESR)
Full biochemical screen, including renal function tests (urea, electrolytes and creatinine), liver function tests (LFT), calcium and blood sugar
Immunoglobulin analysis
Creatine kinase
Thyroid function tests (TFT)
Serological screening tests
Chest X-ray (CXR)
Ultrasound abdominal scan
Electrocardiogram (ECG)
Urinalysis
Peak-flow lung measurement (to determine the necessity for vitalography)

A management audit of the MAP has recently been conducted, looking at all aspects of patient care and the service provided by the Programme. A final report is in preparation and MOD expects to receive this shortly. We intend that this will be made public in due course. This work will then be followed by a clinical audit which will include a review of the range of tests and examinations currently undertaken at the MAP.

The tests listed are the baseline investigations at the MAP; additional investigations and/or referrals to other consultants/specialists are sometimes required for particular patients. As part of this, any tests which are considered clinically appropriate by the examining MAP physician, which could include those to detect the presence of uranium, are arranged. However, MAP physicians have not so far considered it clinically necessary to conduct tests on any MAP patients to detect the presence of uranium.

Contrary to some recent media reports, the MOD is not conducting testing in relation to the possible exposure of Gulf veterans to DU, secret or otherwise.

On 16 December 1998, Official Report, columns 520–22, I announced that I had asked my officials to collate the information which the Department possesses concerning mechanisms which could be used to test for the presence of uranium in the human body. I expect to publish the results of this work shortly and will make arrangements for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

The MAP is not a research programme and it is not involved in any research concerning DU. Although the Ministry of Defence is funding a range of studies into aspects of Gulf veterans' illnesses, none of these are specifically aimed at investigating the relationship between possible exposure to DU and the illnesses being experienced by some Gulf veterans.

The Ministry of Defence is well aware that a link has been suggested between DU exposure and Gulf veterans' illnesses. However, this is only one of a number of factors which have been suggested as causes of Gulf veterans' illnesses and, pending further medical and scientific evidence, MOD is keeping an open mind on this issue. MOD would be very interested to see any new relevant information on this subject.

Personnel Strategy

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out his Department's Armed Forces Overarching Personnel Strategy. [74651]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 4 March 1999]: A key outcome of the Strategic Defence Review was a widespread recognition of the need for an Armed Forces Overarching Personnel Strategy. We are currently developing this important strategy, which will be a major contribution to improving the joint environment in which the Armed Forces will increasingly work. We will keep the House fully informed as this work matures.

Special Advisers

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the meetings since May 1997 held with representatives of the British defence industry by each of his special advisers. [74642]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 4 March 1999]: Both special advisers meet representatives of the British defence industry in the course of their duties.

Mr. Bernard Gray has particular responsibilities in relation to defence procurement and industrial policy and is therefore in day-to-day contact with a wide variety of industry representatives.

Government to Government Programme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Swindon, South (Ms Drown) of 26 January 1999, Official Report, columns 173–74, if he will list the customer Governments which contributed to the cost of project offices for Government to Government programmes, stating in each case the size of receipts; and what the total receipts were in the three previous financial years. [76125]

Mr. Spellar: The customer Governments which contributed to the cost of project offices for Government to Government defence programmes are those of Kuwait, Malaysia and Saudi Arabia. Details relating to the level of contributions made are confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the customer Governments concerned. I am therefore withholding that information under the provisions of Exemption 1 of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

AWE Aldermaston

Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with Hunting-Brae over replacing the Pangbourne pipeline with an evaporator following the enforcement notice served on AWE Aldermaston by the Environment Agency. [76018]

Mr. Spellar: The Enforcement Notice served on 9 February made no reference to the Pangbourne pipeline. There is no requirement at present to replace it. However, AWE has for some years been examining the best environmental choices for all its discharges, which includes consideration of evaporators and absorbers and the MOD Compliance Office at Aldermaston have been involved in this work. If, at some point in the future, replacement is considered necessary, AWE, the Ministry of Defence and the Environment Agency will have to be satisfied that any alternative offers environmental advantages over the present system.

Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the nuclear installations inspectorate's licence of AWE Aldermaston. [76020]

Mr. Spellar: I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Trigat

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to sign the Memorandum of Understanding in respect of Medium Range Trigat. [76063]

Mr. Spellar: We are considering whether the UK will participate in the Industrialisation and Production Phase of the collaborative Medium Range TRIGAT programme.

Falklands Military Garrison

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost in 1998 of maintaining the Falklands military garrison; and if he will make a statement. [76367]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The outturn cost to the Ministry of Defence of the Falkland Islands Garrison in financial year 1998–99 is expected to be approximately £71 million. This figure relates to the costs incurred by the Commander British Forces Falkland Islands only. It does not include the costs of the RAF airbridge to the Falkland Islands, nor the cost of naval deployments to the South Atlantic. These costs fall to other budgets and are not separately identified.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Ministerial visits made to Argentina in 1998. [76366]

Mr. George Robertson: No Ministers from my Department visited Argentina in 1998.

Low-flying Aircraft

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints were received concerning low-flying British military aircraft in 1998. [76266]

Mr. Spellar: 5,102 complaints and inquiries about aircraft operating within the UK Low-Flying System are recorded centrally as having been received by my Department in 1998. These records do not specify the nationality of the aircraft prompting the report and the number of British aircraft concerned could only be identified at disproportionate cost.

JP233 System

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of replacing the Saudi Arabian JP233 system with Paveway 111 bombs; from which budget the money was drawn; at whose request and for what reason the replacement was required; and if he will make a statement. [76278]

Mr. George Robertson: Under the provisions of the Ottawa Convention and the Landmines Act 1998, which came into force on 1 March 1999, the UK cannot continue to support the Saudi Arabian JP233 anti-airfield weapons, which were supplied by the UK under the Al Yamamah project. As explained in a Minute laid before Parliament on 4 February 1999, our offer to destroy Saudi JP233s, to provide 100 Paveway 3s as replacements, and to provide modifications and training to allow the Saudis to operate the new system underlines our commitment to the Ottawa Convention, while maintaining strong relations with a strategically important, friendly country. The estimated cost of these measures is £15–17 million, to be funded by the Ministry of Defence.

Neo-Nazi Groups

Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on steps taken to curb the activities of neo-Nazi groups reported to have infiltrated sections of the British armed forces. [75987]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 11 March 1999]: Since coming to office we have made very clear our policy on zero tolerance for racism in the Armed Forces. Our priority is for the development of an organisational culture which welcomes racial diversity.

Our policies, applied rigorously and reinforced by strong leadership from the Service Chiefs, are designed to ensure that racism is eliminated.

All personnel, of whatever rank, need to understand that there is no home or hiding place for racist attitudes or behaviour. This must be understood not only by serving personnel but also by potential recruits and society generally. The Armed Forces, as a major institution and public body, are taking a clear stand on this. Prejudice, when encountered, is being challenged. Those who transgress the high standards required are, and will continue to be, dealt with firmly. This will include discharge if appropriate.

It has long been the policy of the Armed Forces that Service life precludes membership of, or support for, groups or organisations whose purpose includes incitement to racial hatred and violence. All three Services already have in place regulations and instruction which give clear guidance to the Chain of Command on the rules, grounds and process governing membership of groups which is incompatible with Service life. This morning, each Service Chief has written to the Command Chain to remind them of the powers and procedures that are available to them and to ensure they are applied in all appropriate circumstances.

We are continuing to place a high priority on robust awareness training in equal opportunities. Racial equality is an integral part of this; and we have made it mandatory for all senior officers of Brigadier and equivalent level and above to receive such training. Training for remaining personnel has also been strengthened and is being kept under constant review to ensure our priorities are fully reflected and brought to the attention of all personnel at every opportunity.

Harrier Jump-jet

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what type of aircraft the Government expects to replace the Harrier jump-jet at the end of its service life. [76088]

Mr. Spellar: As announced in the Strategic Defence Review, a Future Carrier-Borne Aircraft (FCBA) will replace the Royal Navy Sea Harrier and Royal Air Force Harrier from around 2012. A strong contender for FCBA is a variant of the US Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) and the UK is currently participating in the Concept Demonstration Phase. We are also assessing a number of other options including a navalised Eurofighter, Rafale-M, F/A 18E/F and an Advanced Harrier variant.

Brit Awards

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those Ministers in his Department who were present at the recent Brit awards in an official capacity, indicating the organisation acting as their sponsor or host. [76647]

Mr. George Robertson: I was the only Minister from my Department to attend the Brit Awards this year, and was invited by the British Phonographic Institute. I have recorded my attendance with the Registrar of Members Interests.

Weaponry Gifts

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what gifts of weaponry have been made by the United Kingdom Government to (a) overseas Governments and (b) armed forces since 1 January 1990. [76044]

Our records do not show whether an item listed as gifted to an overseas Government was destined for that Government's armed forces. Most of the larger items of equipment shown as gifted to overseas Governments were surplus and were destined for national museums or to museums having official status.

CABINET OFFICE

Press Releases

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will set out the conventions governing the propriety and cost of press releases issued by his Department, its agencies and non-departmental bodies; and what is the total cost of the press releases issued since May 1997. [71474]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer on 16 February 1999]: Rules governing the work of the Government Information and Communication Service are laid down in the "Guidance on the work of the Government Information Service", published by the Cabinet Office in July 1997. More specific guidance on the writing and issuing of press releases is given in the "Working Guide for Government Information Officers". Copies of both these documents have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

The cost of press releases by the Cabinet Office and its agencies since May 1997 is approximately £42,500. Details relating to the Central Office of Information can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many press releases have been issued by his Department, its agencies and non-departmental bodies in each of the years 1990 to 1998. [71473]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer on 16 February 1999]: The total number of press releases issued by the Cabinet Office and its agencies between 1980 and 1998 was 1,449. This can be broken down as follows:

Year	Number of press releases
1998	305
1997	189
1996	218
1995	330
1994	272

The Central Office of Information issued 28 press notices in its own right in 1998. However, records dating further back are not maintained.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the organisational development project with the Zimbabwe Republic Police. [76281]

Clare Short: This project aims to provide efficient and accountable police services to the people of Zimbabwe, especially the poor and disadvantaged. Recent reviews indicate that it is making good progress. The Zimbabwe Republic Police are already working more closely with local communities in the planning and delivery of improved police services.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the total number of occasions when (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity since 2 May 1997. [76827]

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) pursuant to his answer of 16 February 1999, Official Report, column 739, on Iraq, from whom he received the account of the episode relating to the 16-year-old Iraqi youth; [72887]

(2) when he will reply to the question from the hon. Member for Linlithgow of 22 February, on the episode relating to the 16-year-old Iraqi youth (ref 72887). [75497]

Mr. Fatchett [holding answers 25 February and 8 March 1999]: I received the information from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Nepal

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations he has made to the Government of Nepal concerning the disappearance of Mr. Rajendra Dhakal, Chairman of the Forum for the Protection of Human Rights in Grakha District; [76273]

(2) what reports he has received relating to the disappearance of nine passengers following police arrests in Kailai District in Nepal on 4 February; [76272]

(3) what reports he has received of the arrest and alleged torture of Mr. Shaha, President of the District Bar Association and the People's Concern Movement in Nepal; [76252]

(4) what reports he has received relating to killings in the town of Jajarkot in Nepal. [76274]

Mr. Fatchett: We have only very limited knowledge of these specific cases which arise in the more general context of the "People's War" being waged in the mid-Western region of Nepal. We have raised with the Government of Nepal on several occasions our concerns about reports of human rights abuse by the police.

Slovak Nationals

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the need for Slovak nationals to obtain visas in order to visit the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [R] [76262]

Ms Quin: Our decision to introduce visas for Slovak nationals was taken only after careful thought, and as a practical and temporary step to address a practical problem.

Ministers have taken every opportunity to raise the issue with their Slovak opposite numbers. We are pleased that the Slovak Government are determined to tackle the problems which compelled us to take this action.

We review our visa regime at regular intervals. We will lift the requirement as soon as we are confident that the problems which led to the imposition of the visa regime will not reappear.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the arrangements to enable citizens of Sierra Leone to visit the United Kingdom for business or training purposes; and when he expects to resume the issuing of visas to enter the United Kingdom to people applying in Freetown. [76445]

Mr. Fatchett: The British High Commission in Freetown is still closed. Citizens of Sierra Leone seeking a visa to visit the United Kingdom may apply at any British Diplomatic Mission offering a full entry clearance service. For other categories of visa, applicants who would in normal circumstances submit their application in Freetown are required to apply at British Diplomatic Missions in Dakar, Banjul or Abidjan. The security situation in Freetown is being monitored carefully. UK Based staff will return to Post as soon as it is safe to do so. Visa issuing will resume as soon as practicable thereafter.

Senator Pinochet

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs who was informed by the Head of the Latin America and Caribbean Department following his telephone conversation at midday in Friday 16 October 1998, of the nature of his conversation with the Chilean Ambassador concerning Senator Pinochet's travel arrangements. [76430]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Head of the Latin America and Caribbean Department informed other FCO officials of his conversation with the Chilean Ambassador on 16 October about Senator Pinochet's travel arrangements.

Pakistan (Human Rights)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the human rights abuses towards Christians in Pakistan on which he has received reports. [76157]

Mr. Fatchett: We have received several reports of alleged persecution against religious minorities in Pakistan, including Christians. I raised our concerns on this issue with the Minister of Law during my visit to Pakistan in February.

European Commissioners

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to place in the Library all new declarations of European Commissioners' interests. [76286]

Ms Quin: Copies of all new declarations of European commissioners' interests will be placed in the Library when they are made available by the Commission.

General Affairs Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which EU bodies were instructed at the General Affairs Council of 22 and 23 February to examine EU support for the peace process. [76284]

Mr. Fatchett: The General Affairs Council of 22 and 23 February tasked all EU bodies, including the European Commission and the EU Special Envoy, Ambassador Moratinos, the European Commission, to examine how the EU can continue to support the peace process.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) of 5 March 1999, Official Report, columns 940–42, on the General Affairs Council, if he will place in the Library a copy of the paper presented by the presidency on work in progress to prepare for entry into force of the Amsterdam Treaty; what was the nature of the discussion on the Schengen Acquis; when the Committee of Permanent Representatives plans to meet to consider the paper; and if he will make a statement. [76369]

Ms Quin: I have arranged for a copy of the Presidency paper to be placed in the Library of the House. There was no detailed discussion of it at the 22 February General Affairs Council. The paper was a report on the existing situation, and there are no plans for further discussion of it.

India (Human Rights)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the human rights abuse towards Christians in India on which he has received reports. [76156]

Mr. Fatchett: We have received various reports of attacks on religious minorities in India. The following table, giving the number of attacks against Christians in India in 1998 and to 20 February this year, was provided by the Indian Minister of Home Affairs to the Indian Parliament on 24 February. I have raised our concerns with the Indian authorities on several occasions most recently during the visit to London by the Indian Prime Minister's national Security adviser, Mr. Mishram, on 20 January.

Chilean Embassy

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many occasions over the period 14 to 15 October 1998 representatives from the Chilean Embassy contacted his Department's representatives in London. [76431]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: While we do not keep comprehensive records of telephone calls, we are not aware of any contact between representatives of the Chilean Embassy and the FCO on 14 October. For details of the conversation with the Chilean Embassy on 15 October, I refer the right hon. Member to my replies to the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Trend) on 25 January 1999, Official Report, column 149, and 1 February 1999, Official Report, columns 496–97, and to my reply to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) on 10 February 1999, Official Report, columns 294–95.

Malta

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Ministers are planning to pay an official visit to Malta in the next four months. [76429]

Ms Quin: I plan to pay an official visit to Malta during the first week in May.

James Miles and Paul Loseby

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what sentences were imposed on James Miles and Paul Loseby at the time of the trial and at the time of the appeal. [76426]

Mr. Fatchett: James Miles and Paul Loseby were each sentenced to four years imprisonment at trial which was increased to five years at appeal. The Public Prosecutor has appealed against the five year sentence and the case is currently with the Supreme Court.

Sanctions Policy

Ms Ryan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on sanctions; and if he will make a statement. [77194]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Government have recently completed a wide-ranging review of its sanctions policy. All Whitehall Departments with an interest in sanctions were involved in the review.

As a result, the Government have decided to launch a new policy of better targeted "smarter" sanctions. This will sharpen the focus and effectiveness of sanctions whilst trying to minimise their impact on ordinary people, including children, and on our own commercial and economic interests.

Apart from the threat of or use of force, which will remain essential in the more extreme cases, sanctions are the only coercive measure available to the international community to respond to challenges to international peace and security. The review concluded that they will remain an important tool of our foreign policy.

The review also concluded, however, that better targeting would be likely to enhance the effectiveness of international sanctions and minimise the risk of harm to ordinary people. A range of sanctions, of varying type and severity, is available and different measures may be selected depending on particular circumstances. Comprehensive sanctions should be reserved for cases where the objective is to isolate and contain a very serious transgressor.

The review concluded that although the circumstances in which sanctions are imposed vary from case to case, there are a number of broad principles that should normally be followed. Sanctions should:

be targeted to hit the regime, rather than ordinary people.

include exemptions to minimise the humanitarian impact on innocent civilians.

have clear objectives, including well-defined and realistic demands against which compliance can be judged, and a clear exit strategy.

have effective arrangements for implementation and enforcement by all states, especially be neighbouring countries.

avoid unnecessary adverse impact on UK economic and commercial interests.

The review also agreed a revised set of inter-Departmental procedures for the efficient imposition, amendment, and lifting of sanctions, as well as for their enforcement and monitoring. These will further improve co-ordination between Whitehall Departments on sanctions issues.

I shall keep the House informed of current sanctions and their scope on a yearly basis. All new sanctions or any amendments to existing sanctions will be announced at the time. We shall shortly be laying in the Library of the House a list of all sanctions imposed by the UK. An updated version will be laid in the Library annually (or more frequently if policy changes require a revision).

Yemen

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contact the British Embassy in Yemen has had with human rights groups in the past year; and if he will make a statement. [76203]

Mr. Fatchett: Our Embassy in Sana'a has provided modest financial support for human rights organisations operating in Yemen. It has assisted with inward and outward visits by MPs and other officials, including projects run by the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, to help improve good government. We have also provided assistance in training judges and related officials on national and international human rights law and its application in the court-room. We are looking to continue similar cooperative projects in the future.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Yemen concerning human rights and cases of kidnapping. [76204]

Mr. Fatchett: We regularly raise our concerns about human rights issues with the Yemeni Government. I refer my hon. Friend to my previous answer (76203) and the answer I gave him on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 606. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has also raised with the Yemeni Prime Minister, our concerns about the incidence of kidnapping in Yemen, especially where UK nationals have been involved.

European Citizenship

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's interpretation of the expression "true European citizenship" in Recital 6i of COM(98)0331-C4–0511/98–98/0197(COD); and if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on this matter. [76432]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have been asked to reply.

The European Commission's proposals for an action programme for youth from the year 2000 include the objective of promoting active citizenship among the young people of Europe. The Government are participating positively in negotiations with other Member States on the content of the new programme.

TREASURY

Passported Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which passported benefits recipients of (a) working families tax credit and (b) disabled persons tax credit will be entitled. [71500]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 16 February 1999]: The Government are committed to ensuring that Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Persons Tax Credit recipients who need it continue to receive the help provided by passported benefits through for example, the NHS Low Income Scheme, the Social Fund Maternity and Funeral Payments, the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme and legal advice and assistance.

Green Transport

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what research his Department has carried out on the effects of the taxation of employee' benefits from green transport plans; and if he will make a statement. [74854]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 5 March 1999]: Inland Revenue and Treasury officials have had discussions about the present tax rules with officials at the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions, who are in the lead in carrying out the research concerning green transport plans referred to in the Integrated Transport White Paper.

Alcohol Smuggling

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures he will take to make up for the loss of revenue caused by the smuggling of alcohol. [75491]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 8 March 1999]: Customs and Excise estimate that the revenue lost from the smuggling of alcohol in 1998 was £220 million, which is a little over 2 per cent. of total alcohol revenue receipts. Revenue leakage caused by smuggling and fraud is a factor that the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes into account when taking his Budget decisions.

The Government take all excise smuggling very seriously and are committed to tackling the problem. A comprehensive set of measures resulting from recommendations made in the Alcohol and Tobacco Fraud Review is currently being implemented.

Mortgage Lending (Code of Practice)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement concerning the lending practices of The Money Store, Kensington and other non-status lenders; [74194]

(2) if he will investigate the effect (a) Private Label, (b) The Mortgage Operation and (c) other mortgage packaging companies have on the customer's choice of product; [74195]

(3) if he will put forward legislation to ensure that the fees that non-status lenders and mortgage packaging companies pay to lenders are disclosed. [74196]

Mr. Love: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what monitoring his Department is undertaking regarding compliance with the industry code of mortgage lending practice; what percentage of lenders and intermediaries now subscribe to the code; what future consultation is planned with the industry regarding the impact of the code; and if he will make a statement. [74178]

Ms Hewitt: All aspects of the mortgage market will be taken into account when considering whether mortgage advice should be regulated under the Financial Services and Markets Bill.

Church Buildings (VAT)

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the proposal to exempt from VAT payments works to church buildings. [75171]

Ms Hewitt: Treasury Ministers have received numerous letters asking for a zero rate of VAT for repairs to church buildings. Repairs to all existing buildings have always been standard rated. Under the provisions of the sixth VAT directive we cannot introduce a new zero rate.

Stamp Duty Reserve Tax

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has made of the loss of stamp duty reserve tax on cross-border mergers and take overs for the tax year 1998–99 through United Kingdom companies creating bearer shares denominated in foreign currency which are put into a depositary or clearance system. [74126]

Ms Hewitt: The proposed measure announced on 29 January to close a Stamp Duty Reserve Tax loophole relating to cross-border takeovers and mergers by UK companies is intended to protect the revenue from shares and other securities which is provisionally estimated to be £2.6 billion in 1998–99.

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the gross yield from stamp duty reserve tax for the tax year 1998–99. [74127]

Ms Hewitt: Net receipts from stamp duty (including stamp duty reserve tax) on transactions of shares and other securities are provisionally estimated to be £2.6 billion in 1998–99.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if (a) she, (b) civil servants in her Department or (c) special advisers in her Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75878]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531. There have been no instances of members of Select Committees giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts of Select Committee reports, or of parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor to the best of my knowledge have there been any occasions on which members of Select Committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under House of Commons Standing Order 116.

Prisoners

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what powers she has to halt the early release of prisoners convicted of scheduled offences within the meaning of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Acts 1973, 1978, 1991 and 1996. [70138]

Mr. Ingram: The early release of prisoners following the Belfast Agreement takes place in accordance with the provisions of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. Under that legislation, the Secretary of State must specify any organisation which she believes is concerned in Northern Irish terrorism, or in promoting or encouraging it, and has not established or is not maintaining a complete and unequivocal ceasefire. Prisoners who support a specified organisation are not eligible for early release.

In addition the Secretary of State has the discretion under the Act to make an order suspending the operation of the whole scheme. Whether to make such an order would require my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, to make a judgment in the round, taking into account all relevant factors pertaining at the time.

WALES

Hepatitis C

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales are currently suffering from hepatitis C; and of these, how many have contracted the condition as a consequence of receiving contaminated blood products in the course of NHS treatment. [75561]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: It is not known how many people in Wales are currently suffering from hepatitis C. However, data are available on newly diagnosed cases reported from laboratories although cases may not be identified until years after the infection is acquired. 1,030 newly identified cases of hepatitis C were reported to Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre Wales (CDSC) from laboratories in Wales between 1995 and 1997. Of these 28 were reported where blood transfusion or blood product receipt was a possible risk factor (although other risk factors may have also been present). The Haemophilia Society reports that there are 105 people infected with hepatitis C through their National Health Service treatment with blood products. A number of NHS patients other than haemophiliacs will have acquired hepatitis C infection.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mixed-sex Hospital Wards

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many mixed-sex wards there are in NHS hospitals in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [76213]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

National Assembly

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the intended use of Crickhowell House following the completion of the permanent Assembly building. [76220]

Mr. Michael: Crickhowell House will continue to provide the permanent accommodation for the majority of Assembly Members and their direct support staff once the new building is available for use. It will also continue to house a significant number of Assembly staff and officials, including the support staff of the Cabinet Secretariat and Office of the Presiding Officer.

The temporary debating chamber has been designed to have a secondary use, and in conjunction with the adjacent space will provide an excellent facility for conferences, seminars, broadcasting, meetings and training events. The temporary committee rooms will help satisfy the expected demand for additional meeting rooms.

Following the transfer of functions, these issues will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Dental Services

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the difference between the public expenditure estimate for general dental services in Wales in 1997–98 and the cost outturn. [75321]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The public expenditure estimate for gross general dental services in Wales for 1997–98 was £75.1 million and the cost outturn was £76.9 million, a difference of £1.8 million.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many adults have been seen by dentists under NHS regulations in each health authority area in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [75325]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information on the number of adult courses of dental treatment paid for under NHS regulations is given in the following table. It should be noted that one adult may have more than one course of treatment during a year.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes by health authority area have taken place in dental registrations of (a) children and (b) adults since the introduction of the 15 month registration period. [75332]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The 15 month registration period was introduced in September 1996 and information on the percentage of the population registered with a dentist for NHS care for each quarter from that date to September 1998 is given in the following table. Prior to September 1996 the registration period for adults ran for two years from the date of registration or re-registration; the registration period for a child ran from the date of registration or re-registration to the 31 December of the following year.

The introduction of the 15 month period for adults and action by the Dental Practice Board to remove duplicate registrations, has led to a decrease in the number of adult registrations in all Health Authorities.

The main effect of the introduction of the 15 month period for child registrations has been to remove the seasonal effect resulting from the lapse of all child registrations at the end of each year. This last occurred in December 1997 and since that date the pattern of registrations has levelled out in all Health Authorities.

[1] Aged 17 or under

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of treatments requiring prior approval from the Dental Practices Board was submitted to dental reference officers for further examination in each of the last three years; what percentage was refused; and what was the (a) shortest, (b) longest and (c) average time taken to consider these submissions. [75310]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information for 1995–96 is not available.

In 1996–97, 6 per cent. of prior approval applications in England, Wales and the Isle of Man were referred to dental reference officers for further investigation and 71 per cent. of these patients were seen ie 4 per cent. of the total number of applications. In 1997–98, 9 per cent. were investigated further and 56 per cent. of patients were seen ie 5 per cent. of the total number of applications.

Of those patients seen in 1996–97, the dental officer had a fundamental disagreement with the treatment plan in 0.47 per cent. of cases and had a major disagreement in 4.72 per cent. of cases. For patients seen in 1997–98, there was a fundamental disagreement in 0.38 per cent. of cases and a major disagreement in 3.48 per cent. of cases. However, refusal to give approval takes place only after further consultation at the Dental Practice Board.

In 1996–97, the quickest approval was given in 45 days, the average time taken was 85 days, and the longest time taken was 138 days. In 1997–98, the equivalent periods were 46, 97 and 124 days respectively.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about current audit and peer review projects for general dental practitioners; what assessment he has made of their effectiveness, value for money and prospects for further development; and what plans he has for additional financial support. [75312]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: A Peer Review scheme for general dental practitioners (GDPs) in Wales was introduced as a pilot in September 1991. The pilot scheme has been twice reviewed by outside consultants, and on each occasion it was concluded that the scheme was a valuable initiative. The latest review in June 1996 reported favourably on the cost effectiveness and benefit for patients.

The Peer Review scheme and Audit for GDPs is well established. An Assessment Panel composed of representatives from the dental profession and the Welsh Office, is responsible for the funding, probity, training and development in Wales.

Details concerning the budget for Peer Review in 1999–2000 will not be known until the end of March. Funding for dental audit will fall within the Clinical Governance remit of Local Health Groups which all have dental membership on their boards.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to receive the report of the Health Authorities' Chief Executives' Group on oral and maxillofacial services in South Wales. [75315]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The South Wales Health Authorities' review of Oral and Maxillofacial Surgery Services is expected to be completed by October. The conclusions of the report will be for health authorities to consider and take forward.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of all types of dental treatment in each of the last three years was referred to a dental reference officer for scrutiny; and what percentage was declared to be (a) of poor quality and (b) invalid. [75317]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information for 1995–96 is not available. Of courses of treatment scheduled for payment for England, Wales and the Isle of Man in 1996–97 and 1997–98, about 0.5 per cent. and 0.6 per cent. respectively were referred to a dental reference officer for scrutiny.

Of those patients seen, the Dental Officer had a major or fundamental disagreement with the treatment in 1.75 per cent. of cases in 1996–97 and 1.37 per cent. of cases in 1997–98. These percentages cover both poor quality and invalid treatments. The Dental Officer was unable to comment in 3 per cent. of cases seen in 1996–97 and 4 per cent. in 1997–98.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the problems of providing satisfactory dental services in rural areas and the steps taken to deal with them since 1 April 1998. [75327]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I recognise that, in the more rural parts of Wales, patients who are not registered with a dentist can sometimes find it difficult to obtain NHS dental treatment close to home.

Stage 2 of the Welsh Office dental initiative, launched on 10 July 1998, introduced more flexible conditions specifically designed to address the particular problems being encountered in rural parts of Wales. It offers the possibility of enhanced levels of grant aid for dentists who want to open new part-time or branch practices in certain areas where this would be the best way of meeting local needs.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes have taken place, by health authority area, in child dental registrations since June 1996; and what steps he has taken to encourage the registration with a general dental practice of children up to five years of age. [75331]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information requested is as follows:

Health authority	30 June 1996 Number	30 June 1996 Percentage	30 September 1998 Number	30 September 1998 Percentage
Bro Taf	102,012	57.7	100,975	56.8
Dyfed
Powys	59,450	57.0	56,965	54.8
Gwent	81,648	60.4	80,728	59.6
Morgannwg	79,872	70.5	76,968	68.1
North Wales	85,050	57.7	89,408	60.8

Changes introduced in September 1996 brought the child registration system in line with the adult system, with both running for a period of 15 months from the date of registration or re-registration. Prior to this child registrations ran from the date of registration or re-registration to the 31 December of the following calendar year, which created a seasonal pattern in registrations. The change was fully effective by the end of December 1997 but care should be taken when comparing data from different times of the year where one quarter was prior to September 1996 as data are not strictly comparable.

Despite general improvements in the oral health of the population, and of children in particular, there are considerable regional variations. Even in areas where the prevalence of tooth decay is low, there remain pockets of disease frequently related to social deprivation. The Department has developed a targeted incentive scheme to increase the registration of children in their early years. This will deliver enhanced fees to dentists for registered patients aged 5 and under who live in specified areas.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the need for facilities for dento-alveola surgery. [75319]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: None. Dento-alveolar surgery is mostly carried out within the facilities of primary dental care. Dento-alveolar surgery requiring more specialist treatment is provided by Hospital Dental Services based in District General Hospitals and it is for Health Authorities to assess local need for such facilities.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of dentists required in each health authority area to provide a satisfactory level of service. [75323]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: It is a matter for local health authorities to satisfy themselves of the adequacy of dental manpower in light of local needs. Health Authorities are free to make a case for Welsh Office grants to attract new general dental practitioners, subject to funding being available and criteria being met.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales following the publication of the Poswillo Inquiry, how many general dental practitioners underwent training in anaesthesia and equipped their practices to comply with the appropriate recommended safety levels; and what contribution the Welsh Office made towards this training. [75328]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: In 1992, £0.5 million was made available in Wales to assist the delivery of the exacting standards of the Poswillo Report wherever general anaesthesia, sedation were being provided.

The funding was available for:

Community and Hospital Dental Services: £310,000

Postgraduate Dental Education Facilities: £80,000

General Dental Services: £105,000

Resuscitation Manuals: £5,000.

As far as I am aware, no general dental practitioner in Wales underwent the postgraduate training for Non-Consultant Anaesthetists organised under the syllabus agreed by the Royal College of Anaesthetists, and the Faculties of Dental Surgery and General Dental Practitioners. A one-off uniform grant of £7,000 was available for individual practitioners or practices who were able to meet certain specified criteria, but there were no eligible applications. The resuscitation manuals were distributed to every NHS dental practice and to vocational trainees.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for the development of community dental services. [75320]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: It is a matter for each Health Authority to determine, in the light of local circumstances, the appropriate level of Community Dental Service provision for its area.

The Welsh Office dental initiative, first launched in 1995, enables Welsh Health Authorities to offer grant aid for Community Dental Service expansion. To date, grant aid has been awarded for 13 additional posts in the CDS.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dentists are employed by NHS trusts in their community dental services; how many children were treated in the last year for which figures are available in each trust; and how many treatments were made in each trust. [75322]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information is given in the following table:

Community dental service 1997–98

NHS trust	(a) Dentists	(b) Children treated	(c) Total treatments
Cardiff Community Healthcare	9.2	3,842	19,288

(a) Whole-time equivalent of dentists working in the community dental service at 30 September 1997 (excluding locums).

(b) First contact in the financial year for children aged 15 or under.

(c) Total contacts, all ages. May include examination only.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the impact of differences between health authority areas in the average number of dental registrations per dentist on dental health; and what steps have been taken to reduce such differences. [75326]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: A variety of factors determine the average list size of general dental practitioners, including the fact that as independent contractors, they can tailor list sizes according to their working practices and business requirements.

Current information on dental disease levels in the adult population is not presently available but surveys of children aged 5, 12 and 14 are regularly carried out by the British Association for the Study of Community Dentistry. Current information available from those surveys shows no correlation between list sizes and disease levels.

The Welsh Office is committed to improving the health and well being of the population of Wales and to reducing inequalities in health status. The primary aim of the Welsh Office dental initiative has been designed to address those inequities both in the provision of NHS services and in the dental health of the population.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of fees paid to dentists was deducted to cover allowable expenses; and what was the (a) average, (b) highest and (c) lowest income recorded for dentists in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [75311]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The calculation of General Dental Practitioners' average earnings and expenses follow the convention established for the Dental Rates Study Group (DRSG)[1] of focusing on a subset of principal dentists who have been under contract for the previous year without substantial breaks in service. The information about dentists' expenses is derived from a confidential survey of a sample of dentists' practice accounts, undertaken by the Inland Revenue. Only DRSG principals are included in the sample.

Expenses, as a percentage of gross earnings, for General Dental Practitioners (in Great Britain) for the period 1991–92 and 1994–95 were:

1991–92: 54.0

1992–93: 53.9

1993–94: 55.7

1994–95: 54.6.

For the combined year 1995–96 and 1996–97 results from a survey of non-associate dentists indicate that, for all GDS dentists, expenses as a percentage of gross earnings would be around 56.8 per cent., the rise from 1994–95 reflecting in part the treatment of capital allowances.

The other information requested is not readily available on a Wales only basis and I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

[1] The Dental Rates Study Group comprises representatives of Health Departments and the dental profession. Its main responsibility is to make recommendations on dentists' fees after taking into account practice expenses.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the dental practice incentive scheme and the extent to which it has led to an increase in (a) the number of general dental practitioners and (b) the number of adults and children being seen and treated under NHS regulations. [75314]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The primary aim of the scheme was, and still is, to enable Health Authorities to attract new NHS dentists into those parts of Wales where they were most needed.

Grants have already been paid for 33 new practices and 29 expanded practices. There are also another 3 practices and 7 expanding practices for which grant offers have been made.

The number of dentists working in the General Dental Service in Wales is at an all-time high of 955—a 9 per cent. increase since September 1995 when the scheme was first launched.

The number of courses of treatment for adults increased from 1.35 million in 1995–96 to 1.45 million in 1997–98. Comparable data for children are not available.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many treatments requiring prior approval from the Dental Practices Board were submitted in each of the last three years; how many were refused; and what was the (a) shortest, (b) longest and (c) average time taken to consider these requests. [75318]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The number of prior approval applications, which relate to England, Wales and the Isle of Man, received by the Dental Practice Board and the number of these referred for investigation is as follows:

	Prior approval applications	Number referred
1995–96	548,753	[1]—
1996–97	548,741	33,126
1997–98	554,584	49,833

The number of applications referred in 1995–96 is not available.

The shortest time for dealing with applications was one day.

The longest time for approval was:

1995–96	138	[1]—
1996–97	35	138
1997–98	45	124

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the advantages of dentists participating in information management and technology programmes; and what financial support he intends to provide for such in-service development. [75329]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The Welsh Office will be publishing a Strategic Framework for Information Management and Technology for Health Care and Health Improvement in Wales in mid-March.

66 per cent. of NHS general dental practitioners in Wales are already linked electronically to the Dental Practice Board, (DPB), and utilising information management and technology systems. Grants of £900 are available from the DPB to dentists, intending to establish electronic links, for the purchase of suitable computer systems.

The Directors of Dental Public Health for each of the Welsh Health Authorities, with advice and financial support from the Welsh Office, commissioned the Dental Public Health Unit of the University of Wales College of Medicine to carry out a project to assess the information technology requirements of the Community Dental Service in Wales. The recommendations from the project report will be considered within the provisions of the Strategic Framework.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, by health authority area, dental practices (a) which accept all NHS patients, (b) whose NHS lists are closed, (c) which accept additional family members only on NHS lists and (d) which accept children for NHS treatment only if parents are private patients. [75333]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The information requested is not held by the Welsh Office. Each Health Authority maintains a list of practices with contracts to provide NHS dental services within its area. These authorities are best placed to provide the most up-to-date information to any patient who needs advice on the current acceptance policies of local practices.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of dentists that need to be trained in Wales to ensure (a) the maintenance of the present level of service and (b) that his dental health targets are met. [75324]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Long-term requirements for the numbers of medical and dental staff are modelled at a UK level and both the Department of Health and the Welsh Office receive advice on staffing in Dentistry from the Advisory Group in Medical and Dental Education, Training and Staffing (AGMETS). This Group brings together members of the professions and their regulatory bodies, the academic and research communities, the higher education sector, NHS and patients representatives as well as Welsh Office and Department of Health officials.

Within Wales the Dental Sub-Committee of our national advisory committee—the Medical and Dental Manpower and Education Committee (MeDMEC)—has set as its priority the examination of manpower in primary dental care. The Welsh Office has also funded a research project to investigate factors affecting the recruitment and retention of dentists which is to be carried out by the Postgraduate School of the University of Wales College of Medicine. This work will result in a robust assessment of the needs of the Principality as well as providing information from the situation in Wales to assist wider considerations at UK level.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the cost of clinical waste collection and water service charges for general dental practices; to what extent these costs are accounted for in the payments made to dentists for NHS work; and what plans he has to make changes to the reimbursement of dentists in respect of these costs. [75330]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information about dentists' expenses, including those referred to in this question, is derived from a confidential survey of a sample of dentists' practice accounts, undertaken by the Inland Revenue. These expenses are taken into account in determining the fee scale and include the costs of clinical waste collection. There are no plans to change this arrangement.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Water Fluoridation

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the impact of (a) the fluoridation of water and (b) the cessation of fluoridation of water in Anglesey on the dental health of children; and what studies his Department has conducted on the impact of fluoridation and of the withdrawal of fluoridation on the general health of the population. [75316]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The topping up of water supplies with fluoride to one part per million reduces tooth decay in young children by at least 50 per cent. and confers lifelong oral health gains. Since the cessation of fluoridation in Anglesey, tooth decay in young children there has increased by 168 per cent.

Respondents to the Welsh Office Green Paper "Better Health, Better Wales", published in May 1998, were overwhelmingly in favour of fluoridation. The Welsh Office is considering the responses in conjunction with other health departments which have undertaken similar consultation exercises.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Psychiatric Care (Children)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children in Wales have been admitted to psychiatric care for each year since 1992. [76907]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information on the number of in-patient admissions for children (aged under 16) for psychiatric care is given in the following table. It should be noted that a child may have been admitted more than once during the period.

In-patient admissions[1]

Year	Amount
1992	574
1993	480
1994	444
1995	444
1996	481
1997	483

[1] Data are coded by International Classification of Diseases (ICD)-9 until March 1995 and by ICD-10 thereafter. The codes included are: ICD-9:317 to 319, ICD-10:F70 to F79 (mental retardation), ICD-10:F80 to F89 (disorders of psychological development) and ICD-9:290 to 316, ICD-10:F00 to F69 and F90 to F99 (all other psychiatric/mental illness).

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what evaluation his Department has undertaken of (a) individual social services department's policy and (b) individual psychiatric services in relation to children excluded from school in the last five years. [76903]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: An analysis of children's services plans of Welsh local authorities (1997) identified weaknesses in planning for unmet needs, though some authorities had set targets in relation to children excluded from school.

The Welsh Office is funding, through the Welsh Office of Research and Development (WORD), a project in Swansea which is evaluating strategies for reducing school exclusion.

In its response to Sir William Utting's report of the Children's Safeguards Review, the Government undertook to issue guidance on school exclusion and pupil support relevant to looked after children. Local Education Authorities will also have to set targets for reducing school exclusions as part of their education strategic plans which are to come into effect from 1 September 1999.

The Government's proposals for the reform of children's services include objectives to ensure that children in need and those looked after obtain maximum benefit from educational opportunities.

The Welsh Office is developing a Strategy for Child and Adolescent Mental Health services, with the help of an Advisory Group. The needs of children excluded from school will be taken into account in developing this Strategy.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Health Authorities (Debts)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish for each area and health authority in Wales the level of total debt (a) in cash terms and (b) as a percentage of income. [76921]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Residential Care Homes

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales are in residential care homes in the most recent year for which figures are available in the (a) 16 to 64, (b) 65 to 74, (c) 74 to 84 and (d) 85 years and over age groups; and in each of those categories if he will list the numbers funded by (i) the local authority on a means tested basis, (ii) the individuals themselves and (iii) the Department of Social Security through presented rights. [76906]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The numbers of people in residential care homes in Wales at 31 March 1998 are shown in the following table.

Age group	Local authority homes	Independent homes	All homes
16–64 years	522	1,544	2,066
65–74 years	562	965	1,527
75–84 years	1,711	3,009	4,720
85 and over	2,390	4,664	7,054
Age unknown	7	218	225

Although information on sources of funding is requested from each home, it does not cover all residents. Excluding residents whose source of funding is not known, the proportions of people receiving support from each different source are shown in the following table. A more detailed age breakdown is not available.

Percentage

Age group	Local authority	Private means	DSS preserved rights
Under 65 years	44	7	49
Over 65 years	49	28	23

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the (a) M1 management costs, (b) M2 management costs and (c) management consultancy costs (i) in total and (ii) as a percentage of income for each NHS trust in Wales for the last five years. [76920]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: (a)(b) Figures for M1, which consist of salary costs of only the more senior managers, together with the costs of management consultancy and M2, which adds in the salary costs of all other staff who work in corporate management function of NHS trusts, are available for 1995–96 to 1997–98. Prior to the introduction of the M1 and M2 measures, figures are given for "management costs".

(c) Information on management consultancy costs is not held centrally.

The information is given in the following tables.

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) for the last 10 years how much money was realised from the sale of surplus properties by the NHS in Wales, (b) for the next 10 years how much money he estimates will be realised from the sale of surplus properties by the NHS in Wales and (c) who holds the proceeds of such sales. [76924]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: (a) The list for the last 10 financial years of money realised from sale of surplus properties is as follows:

1997–98	1,292,290.91
1996–97	3,476,827.34
1995–96	4,632,554.78

1989–90	5,474,541.85
1988–89	1,789,803.35

(b) The money estimated to be realised from sale of surplus properties in the next 10 financial years is approximately £30 million.

(c) Until 1994–95 most of the proceeds of sale were returned to Health Authorities. Since then the normal procedure is for sale proceeds to be retained by the Welsh Office and used to part fund the All Wales Capital Programme. Health Authority and Trusts may retain the receipt for a related capital development on production of a sufficiently convincing business case. Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list the amount as a percentage of their special transitional grant for the last five years spent by each local authority in Wales in the independent sector; [76910]

(2) if he will list the amount spent on home care by each local authority in Wales as a percentage of their special transitional grant for the last five years. [76911]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: In Wales the Care in the Community initiative was not funded through a special transitional grant, as it was in England, but was instead distributed as part of the revenue support grant settlement. The distribution of the additional resources was identified as part of the settlement announcement each year and are given in table 1. The amounts spent by each local authority on personal social services in the independent sector are given in table 2. The latest available information on home care expenditure for each local authority in Wales is given in table 3.

Elderly People (Abuse)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the level of abuse of elderly people in difficult care environments in the last five years. [76905]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Identification and monitoring of abuse of older people in care and their protection are the responsibility of local and health authorities in Wales. Information is not held centrally on this. We have established a multi-agency working group, including senior police representatives, to make recommendations on the protection of all vulnerable adults including older people. The policy and practice guidance which will be the outcome of this work will be for the National Assembly to consider.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those firms that have bid for private finance initiative deals in Wales; which of these bids were successful; and to what the bids related. [76923]

Mr. Hain: The Department does not hold information, other than for its own Private Finance Initiative (PFI) projects, on firms that bid for PFI deals in Wales. The Department does hold information on PFI deals once they have been signed, and this information can be summarised as follows:

Project	Successful bidder
Welsh Office IT Network	Siemens Business Systems[1]
Welsh Office A55 (Anglesey)	UK Highways (Tarmac, Laing and Hyder)[2]
Community Hospital at Chepstow	Consortium led by King Sturge and Co.

Car Parking Facilities at the University Hospital of Wales	Britannia Impregilo/APCOA

Other bidders were:
[1] ICL
[2] Autolink, Road Management Group and Connect

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Gray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the commercial plantation of herbicide tolerant genetically modified crops. [74691]

Mr. Rooker: No commercial plantings of genetically modified herbicide tolerant crops will take place in 1999. The Government are determined to ensure that these crops do not harm the environment. We have therefore reached agreement with the industry on a programme of managed development starting this spring, whereby the first field-scale plantings of the crops will be strictly limited and monitored for ecological effects alongside conventional varieties.

Tetcott and South Tetcott Hunt

Angela Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what sums his Department contributed for the installation of incinerators at the Tetcott and South Tetcott Hunt kennels. [75524]

Mr. Morley: This Department, together with the EU, has provided funds for the purchase and installation of incinerators at Tetcott and Kilkhampton under the English LEADER II Community Initiative Structural Funds programme. Both projects were submitted by the North Tamar Business Network Group Limited; one of the local groups though which the LEADER programme is being implemented in the South West. The projects are designed to help farmers reduce costs for the collection and disposal of fallen stock in the North Tamar area. The Tetcott project received funding of £3,750 from each of MAFF and the EAGGF. The Kilkhampton project received funding of £5,084 from each of MAFF and the EAGGF.

Rabbits

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in how many research projects, since research on this subject began, (a) ferrets and (b) shot guns have been considered as a method of rabbit control; and what general conclusions were reached. [75626]

Mr. Rooker: Since 1991–92, the Ministry has funded three research projects which have incorporated information on ferrets and shot guns as methods for rabbit control. The projects involve one research group, whose contracts have been extended for fixed periods following reviews of their work. The information on ferrets and shot guns includes results from research funded by other organisations. This research found that, for ferrets, rabbit populations were reduced by no more than 35 per cent. and, for shot guns, by only 30 per cent. Details for MAFF research for the period prior to 1991–92 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much his Department has spent on research on rabbits in each year since 1969; and how many research projects have been funded in that period. [75630]

Mr. Rooker: Information on expenditure on rabbit research from 1991–92 to 1998–99 was provided by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary on 18 June 1998, Official Report, column 324. The estimate provided in that answer for 1998–99 has been revised to £572,000. Details for the period prior to 1991–92 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the (i) cost, (ii) start date, (iii) planned completion date and (iv) objectives of the research studies (a) developing a visual scaring device to deter rabbits, (b) developing a rabbit management system, (c) developing a method for assessing the size of rabbit population and (d) rabbit behaviour and population dynamics at fenced hot spots; and in the case of (a) what devices have been considered to date. [75624]

Mr. Rooker: The information is as follows:

(a) Developing a visual scaring device to deter rabbits.

(i) £114,000 (total).

(ii) 1 April 1998.

(iii) 31 March 2001.

(iv) To produce and test a prototype scaring device based on a light beam and adapted to prevent the development of habituation by rabbits.

The research is at early stage. Research to date has involved assessing the response of rabbits to light beams to provide a baseline against which to measure the effectiveness of anti-habituation techniques.

(b) Developing a rabbit management expert system.

(i) £619,000 (total).

(ii) 1 April 1998.

(iii) 31 March 2002.

(iv) To produce yield loss models to calculate the losses caused by rabbits to spring barley and grass and to obtain additional data on rabbit populations to incorporate into an expert system.

(c) Developing a method for assessing the size of rabbit populations.

(i) £154,000 (total).

(ii) 1 April 1998.

(iii) 31 March 2001.

(iv) To develop a method under controlled conditions for assessing rabbit abundance.

(d) Rabbit behaviour and population dynamics at fence hot-spots.

(i) £217,000 (total).

(ii) 1 April 1998.

(iii) 31 March 2001.

(iv) To determine the effects of erecting fencing on rabbit population dynamics and ranging behaviour.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many research projects have been undertaken by his Department, and at what total cost, (a) on the effects of rabbit fencing in preventing crop damage by rabbits, (b) to determine effective methods of rabbit control, (c) to investigate the breeding habits of rabbits and (d) to examine the effects on population levels of allowing rabbits to breed unchecked; and what conclusion they reached in each case. [75628]

Mr. Rooker: (a) Six since 1991–92 at a cost of £869,000. This figure relates to whole project costs rather than the proportions of projects specifically addressing fencing. The results of research completed to date have been summarised in an advisory leaflet for landowners and occupiers; a copy of the leaflet has been placed in the Library of the House.

(b) Ten since 1991–92 at a cost of £1.3 million. This figure includes research on fencing. Reports on the results from these projects, where not already covered by my answer of 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 792, have been placed in the Library of the House; their project numbers are:

VC0204

VC0207

VC0208

Where projects have been extended, only the latest report has been placed in the Library.

(c) & (d) Three since 1991–92 at a cost of £390,000. These projects cover the development of mathematical models to identify cost-effective rabbit control strategies; they are therefore also included in the cost given in (b). Information on breeding habits and population levels is included in the models to achieve the primary aim of the research relating to rabbit control strategies. The conclusions were given in my answer on 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 792.

Details for the period prior to 1991–92 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost of the research project, developing humane, environmentally acceptable and cost-effective methods of rabbit control; and what assessment it made of the use of ferrets as a means of rabbit control. [75623]

Mr. Rooker: This project has now ended and the total cost was £479,000. An assessment of the use of ferrets for rabbit control was not included.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many research projects have been undertaken by his Department which have involved predicting the effects of various rabbit populations on crops. [75627]

Mr. Rooker: Since 1991–92, the Ministry has funded seven projects involving prediction of the effects of various rabbit populations on crops; these have now all ended. They consisted mainly of the work of one research group whose contracts have been extended for fixed periods following reviews of the research.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the cost of the research project, irreversible immunocontraception for the control of wild rabbits; and what was the proposed delivery method of the contraceptive. [75625]

Mr. Rooker: The cost was £178,000. The delivery method under consideration for the species-specific immunocontraceptive was an oral bait. Work is continuing on this topic under the project: "Antigen delivery systems for the control of wild rabbits". If an immunocontraceptive is developed, it will have to be approved under the Medicines Act 1986 and careful consideration will need to be given to all the issues surrounding its use.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment his Department has made from the research which it has funded of the effects on (i) crops and (ii) young woodlands from a nearby rabbit population which is (a) light and (b) heavy. [75629]

Mr. Rooker: (i) This topic was covered in the completed research project: "Predicting damage to crops by rabbits". The results are being refined in the project: "Developing a rabbit management expert system". Details of this project are contained in my answer to the right hon. Member's question, ref.75624.

(ii) This completed research has been assessed as part of the Ministry's normal review process. Results from MAFF's research on farm woodlands is made available to farmers. The research was also publicised at a symposium in York on 8 October 1998 addressing MAFF R&D on farm woodlands since 1987. The symposium was attended by organisations with interests in farm woodlands as well as advisers and farmers.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what synopsis his Department has prepared of the conclusions of the research into the (a) effectiveness and (b) cost of legal methods of rabbit control; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [75622]

Mr. Rooker: A single synopsis has not been produced. However, three advisory leaflets based on the results of the Ministry's research on fencing and other control techniques have been produced for landowners and occupiers. Copies have been placed in the Library of the Hosue.

Live Animal Imports

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many checks were carried out in respect of live animal imports at British ports of entry in each year from 1990 to the latest year for which figures are available. [75845]

Mr. Rooker: Council Directive 90/425/EEC of 26 June 1990 (as amended) abolished systematic veterinary checks on live animals at internal European Community frontiers. It provides instead for a system of checks at points of origin and random spot checks at points of destination.

Council Directive 91/496/EEC (as amended) concerns veterinary checks on imports entering the Community from third countries and requires that consignments enter the European Community only through an approved Border Inspection Post (BIP). At the Border Inspection Post they must be subjected to documentary, identity, and physical checks before entering free circulation within the Community.

Statistics concerning the number of veterinary checks carried out at Border Inspection Posts (third country imports only) are readily available for 1994 to 1998. Records for earlier years are not available in a form which would permit the extraction of corresponding figures without disproportionate cost.

Year	Number of veterinary checks on consignments carried out at border inspection posts[1] (third country imports)
1994	6,797
1995	6,550
1996	4,805
1997	7,238
1998	8,826

[1] Based on the number of border crossing certificates issued.

EU Milk Quotas

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the annual European Union milk quota was for British farmers for each year from 1990 to the latest year for which figures are available. [75838]

Mr. Rooker: The total annual European Union milk quota allocation for the UK for each quota year (which runs from 1 April to 31 March) from 1989–90 to 1998–99 is as follows:

	000 litres
1989–90 and 1990–91	14,359,836
1991–92 and 1992–93	14,084,716
1993–94 and 1998–99	14,166,936

Animal Feed Exports

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantity of meat and bonemeal and other high-protein feed products was exported from Britain in each of the last three years of a type which would currently be illegal if used for animal feed in Great Britain. [75837]

Mr. Rooker: Such feed products are not separately identified in official Overseas Trade Statistics.

Within the UK the feeding of mammalian meat and bonemeal to all farmed livestock and the feeding of any mammalian protein (with certain specific exceptions) to ruminants is prohibited. Since February 1996 the State Veterinary Service has conducted a feed sampling programme to monitor compliance with these controls. Two breaches of the feed control legislation have been identified though neither case involved the export of prohibited material.

In addition mammalian meat and bonemeal of UK origin, and animal feed containing it, is included in the EU export ban which came into force in March 1996. No breaches of this ban have been detected.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the current research projects funded by his Department to discover the cause of, and possible remedies for, tuberculosis in cattle. [75830]

Mr. Rooker: In addition to the randomised badger culling trial designed by the Bourne Group, the Ministry is currently funding the following research projects:

Understanding the causes of herd breakdown:

A spatial analysis, using GIS, of risk factors associated with TB incidents in cattle herds in England and Wales.

Bovine TB in badgers and the risks to cattle: a spatial analysis.

Modelling badger populations, the epidemiology of natural infection with Mycobacterium bovis, the risk of spread to cattle and the consequences of control.

DNA fingerprinting of samples from badger culling trial.

The effect on the viability of Mycobacterium bovis of freezing samples prior to culture testing.

An assessment of the validity of the current necropsy protocol to detect tuberculous lesions in the badger.

NVL (no visible lesion) tuberculous badger: pathology, immunology and epidemiology.

Evaluating the effectiveness of currently available strategies to reduce herd breakdown:

Badgers and bovine tuberculosis: a proactive strategy for the control of bovine TB in badger populations.

Analysis of European badger (Mycobacterium meles) population dynamics and social organisation in a population naturally infected with Mycobacterium bovis.

The consequences of perturbation caused by badger removal for the control of TB in cattle: a study of behaviour.

Perturbation study (culture and serology for Mycobacterium bovis).

An ecological and epidemiological study of a badger population naturally infected with Mycobacterium bovis.

An epidemiological and ecological study of a badger population naturally infected with Mycobacterium bovis (laboratory support project).

Longitudinal study of natural Mycobacterium bovis in badgers.

Assessment of the humaneness, efficacy, usability and non-target risk of leg-cuffs for capturing badgers.

Developing improved strategies to reduce herd breakdown:

Development of vaccine candidates for protection of badgers against infection with Mycobacterium bovis.

The development of animal models to test candidate vaccines for Mycobacterium bovis in badgers.

Blood tests to distinguish vaccinated from TB infected cattle: Interferon assay to improve diagnostics in reactors.

The research programme for 1999–2000 has been reviewed in the light of the recommendations of the Krebs report and a research requirement document was published in April 1998. Research will be focused on understanding the causes of outbreaks of bovine TB and developing improved strategies to reduce the number of outbreaks, especially by creating a cattle vaccine. For details of the research projects for 1999–2000 I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to our hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on 10 March 1999, Official Report, column 300.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of (a) the likelihood of the UK's dairy beef herds losing their TB-free status and (b) the implications such a development would have for UK agriculture; and if he will make a statement. [76290]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The officially tuberculosis-free (OTF) status of an individual bovine herd within Great Britain is suspended if an animal in that herd reacts positively to a tuberculin test or if, for any other reason, a veterinary inspector suspects that an animal in that herd is infected with tuberculosis.

The EU legislation (Directive 64/432/EEC), as it currently applies, does not provide for member states, or regions of member states, to obtain OTF status. Certain member states and regions have been exempted from the routine herd testing requirements of the Directive by virtue of a Commission Decision, although they have not been granted OTF status as such. This exemption has never applied to any part of the UK.

Amendments to the Directive, which were agreed during the last UK Presidency and will come into effect from 1 July 1999, provide for member states and regions to apply for OTF status. Outside such areas, the Directive allows cattle from herds with OTF status to be eligible for intra-Community trade provided that they are subject to a tuberculin test, with negative results, either 30 days before or 30 days after movement.

Similar testing requirements applied to live cattle entering intra-Community trade from Great Britain prior to 27 March 1996.

Farming White Paper

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to produce a White Paper based on the results of the Future of Farming consultation. [75839]

Mr. Rooker: My officials are in the process of analysing the results of the consultation exercise on Agenda 2000/CAP Reform. These include some 17,000 responses from individual farmers, more detailed comments from a range of organisations and the reports of consultation meetings held across the country. We shall be publishing the results as part of a further consultation paper in the Spring.

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sight of drafts of select committee reports, in whole or in part, or (ii) been informed of conclusions of select committee reports prior to their publication by the select committees. [75883]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 10 March 1999]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) on 1 March 1999, Official Report, column 531.

There have been no instances of members of select committees, giving me, or my ministerial colleagues, drafts of select committee reports, or parts of reports including their conclusions, before publication. Nor, to the best of my knowledge, have there been any occasions on which members of select committees have given such material to civil servants or special advisers in my Department. This excludes embargoed copies of reports issued under the House of Commons Standing Orders.

Whales

Angela Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Government support the planned joint proposal by Australia and New Zealand to the International Whaling Commission for a whale sanctuary in the Southern Pacific; and if the Government will be actively seeking support from other International Whaling Commission countries for the proposal. [76025]

Mr. Morley: The UK Government strongly support the current International Whaling Commission (IWC) moratorium on commercial whaling and the existing whale sanctuaries. We are opposed to all forms of whaling other than some limited subsistence whaling by indigenous people, and would like to see a permanent, comprehensive international ban on whaling introduced.

We are keen to develop ways of further these objectives and of improving the conservation of whales. We are therefore in favour of the proposal being developed jointly by Australia and New Zealand for a South Pacific Whale Sanctuary, and will strongly support any firm proposal for such a sanctuary that is submitted to the IWC.

Countryside Stewardship Scheme

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the total budget for the Countryside Stewardship Scheme is in each of the next three years in England. [76093]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The total budget available in the 1999–2000 financial year for the Countryside Stewardship including the main scheme, the Arable Stewardship Pilot Scheme and the Upland Experiment is estimated to be over £32 million. This includes payments to farmers, scheme monitoring costs and the work of the Farming and Rural Conservation Agency (FRCA) and not MAFF administrative costs. Figures for 2000–01 and 2001–02 are not yet available.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications were received in England during 1998 to join the Countryside Stewardship Scheme; what area of land they represented; how many were approved; and what area of land they represented. [76095]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The number of applications received for the Countryside Stewardship Scheme in 1998 was 2,445. Of these, 1,290 agreements have been offered to date, covering an area of 21,919 ha of land. Data on the area of land covered by applications which were rejected or deferred are not recorded.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total area of farmland in England covered by the Countryside Stewardship Scheme; and what is the area covered by the scheme within the less favoured areas and its proportion of the total LFA area. [76091]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 11 March 1999]: The total area of land currently under the Countryside Stewardship Scheme in England is 161,896 ha, virtually all of which is managed agriculturally.

The area covered by the scheme in the Less Favoured Areas is approximately 55,500 ha which is 3 per cent. of the total area of LFA.

Quarantine

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to announce proposals on reform of quarantine law. [76221]

Mr. Rooker: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) on 5 March 1999, Official Report, column 946.

Birds (Poisoning)

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has recorded the number of predatory birds killed by poison in the United Kingdom in the last five years. [76756]

Mr. Rooker: MAFF co-ordinates the Wildlife Incident Investigation Scheme which monitors the effects of pesticides on wildlife. The figures are taken from the annual publication, 'Pesticide Poisoning of Animals—Investigations of Suspected Incidents in the UK'.

This information gives details only of incidents involving pesticides, not all types of poisons. These figures represent incidents where pesticides have been identified by analysis, but which are not necessarily the cause of death.

Year	Number of pesticide related incidents involving birds of prey and owls
1993	34
1994	38
1995	31
1996	42
1997	21

Note:
In addition one incident of an owl poisoned by a veterinary medicine has been recorded.

Brit Awards

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those Ministers in his Department who were present at the recent Brit awards in an official capacity, indicating the organisation acting as their sponsor or host. [76654]

Mr. Nick Brown: None.

Badgers

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has appointed an external auditor for the randomised badger culling trial. [77232]

Mr. Rooker: In its report of July 1998 to Ministers, the Independent Scientific Group on TB in cattle recommended that an external auditor be appointed to check field operations. Cresswell Associates, Environmental Consultants of Stroud, Gloucestershire, have now been appointed to carry out this work until November 1999. Audit work after that date will be the subject of a further invitation to tender.

HEALTH

Capital Allocations (London)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis the Regional Office for London will be allocating the general allocation for capital; and if he will list the amount to be allowed to each London health authority. [75134]

Mr. Denham: The basis for capital allocations is in accordance with the priorities set out in Health Service Circular 1998/214. Initial capital allocations to National Health Service trusts and health authorities are set out in the table. Further allocations will be made throughout the year following approval of business cases.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate how many people in each health region are currently waiting for an appointment with a consultant following referral by a general practitioner; if he will provide a breakdown of the length of time for which those people (a) have already waited and (b) are expected to wait; and if he will list for each region the waiting time being given to new entrants to this waiting list for (i) ear, nose and throat, (ii) trauma and orthopaedic, (iii) general surgery, (iv) ophthalmology and (v) gynaecology consultants. [75041]

Mr. Denham: Available information on waiting times for first outpatient appointments following general practitioner written referral is shown in the table. Information on expected waiting times is not available centrally.

Number of patients in England waiting for first outpatient appointments following a general practitioner written referral, for the quarter ended 31 December 1998

North West	54,880	26,534
England	323,218	144,404

Note:
Figures derived from waiting times form QM08 completed by National Health Service trusts each quarter.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were waiting for hospital treatment in the Mid Essex Hospital Trust area in (a) October 1998, (b) November 1998, (c) December 1998 and (d) January 1999. [72888]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 February 1999]: Mid Essex Hospital National Health Service Trust's total waiting list was 11,832 at 31 October 1998; 11,347 at 30 November 1998; 11,359 at the end of December 1998; and 11,172 at the end of January 1999.

Medical School Places

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the capacity for expansion of existing medical schools to accommodate the additional medical places required by the NHS; and if he will make a statement; [75455]

(2) what assessment he has made of the Medical Workforce Standing Advisory Committee evaluation of the capacity for clinical positions for students at existing medical schools; and if he will make a statement. [75453]

Mr. Denham: The third Medical Workforce Standing Advisory Committee report did not include a detailed evaluation of the scope for the expansion of student intake at existing medical schools.

The Government have announced that medical school intake in the United Kingdom will be increased by about 1,000 places by the year 2005, to about 6,000. Because of the current distribution of medical school places, the increase will principally affect student intake in England and Wales.

In England, all universities and their National Health Service partners have been invited to submit proposals for a share of the increase in medical student intake by 12 March 1999. The Joint Implementation Group appointed to oversee the increase will consider all proposals, and make recommendations to the Higher Education Funding Council for England, which will announce the allocations later in the year.

Professional Regulation

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what statutory protection is provided to the patients of (i) paramedics, (ii) chiropodists, (iii) physiotherapists, (iv) clinical psychologists, (v) occupational therapists and (vi) speech therapists in (a) the National Health Service and (b) the private sector; and what plans he has to introduce measures to provide additional protection. [75224]

Mr. Denham: Chiropodists, physiotherapists and occupational therapists are regulated under the Professions Supplementary to Medicine Act 1960. It is an offence to pretend to be registered under that Act. In addition, employment in the National Health Service is restricted to those who are registered under the Act. We plan to replace the Act with new legislation to improve public protection, including restricting the use of common professional title to registered practitioners wherever they work.

NHS employment of speech and language therapists is restricted to members of the Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists. NHS employment of paramedics is restricted to those who have a qualification accredited by the Institute of Health Care Development. We are currently considering petitions to extend the 1960 Act to these two professions.

NHS employment of clinical psychologists is restricted to those who are members of the British Psychological Society. It is for the profession to develop proposals for statutory regulation.

South-west Health Authorities (Funding)

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) for what reason the South West Health Authorities will receive 3 per cent. increase on previous funding instead of the announced funding figure of 4 per cent. for the year 2000; [74430]

(2) if he will take action to ensure that funding for health care in the South West is maintained at 4 per cent. [74432]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 March 1999]: For 1999–2000 the national average real terms increase was 4 per cent.

We use a weighted capitation formula to determine each health authority's fair share target of available resources. Health authorities which already receive more than the formula suggests is their fair share received less than the average increase. Seven of the eight health authorities in the South West were in this position. In 1999–2000 the region as a whole received 1.4 per cent., or £4.3 million more than the formula suggests is their fair share.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the names of the members of the Medicines Control Agency together with a list of their financial interests and research funding. [75726]

Ms Jowell: The Medicines Control Agency (MCA) is a Departmental agency and is accountable direct to Ministers. The staff of the agency are civil servants and are subject to all the normal civil service employment rules, including those covering financial and research interests. The names of senior MCA management and scientific staff can be found on the agency's Website.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the membership of the Medicines Control Agency, indicating for each member their (a) terms of employment, (b) consultancies, (c) research funding and (d) shareholdings in pharmaceutical companies. [75950]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 11 March 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill).

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to implement the recommendations of the Medicines Control Agency to extend its remit to cover (a) health products and (b) nutritional supplements; and if he will make a statement. [75951]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 11 March 1999]: We have no plans to extend the remit of the Medicines Control Agency.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to expand the remit of the Medicines Control Agency to enable it to ban vitamin and other supplements to diet; and if he will make a statement on the composition and background of the members of the Medicines Control Agency. [76760]

Mr. Hutton: We have no plans to extend the remit of the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) or to ban vitamins and other dietary supplements. The MCA is an agency of the Department and is accountable direct to Ministers. The staff of the agency are civil servants and are subject to all the normal civil service employment rules, including those covering financial and research interests. The names of senior MCA management and scientific staff can be found on the agency's Website.

Nurses (Violence)

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of violent incidents against nurses in accident and emergency wards were attributable to (a) substance and (b) alcohol abuse in the last five years for which figures are available. [75953]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 11 March 1999]: Information on the number and specific causes of violent attacks on nursing staff is not available centrally. National Health Service trusts and health authorities collect information locally.

North Essex Health Authority

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to provide a substantive answer to the questions tabled by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford on 22 February, on figures published by the North Essex Health Authority and his Department (Refs. 73118, 73119 and 73120). [76205]

Mr. Denham: I replied to the hon. Member's questions on 12 March 1999, Official Report, column 410.

Chronic Fatigue Syndrome

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of (i) the availability of services within the NHS for sufferers of ME/CFS and (ii) the adequacy of the present arrangements for commissioning social services. [76475]

Mr. Hutton: The National Health Service provides a considerable number of services to which people suffering from Chronic fatigue syndrome/myalgic encephalomyelitis (CFS/ME) have access, and such patients are seen within a wide range of hospital specialties. The recently established CFS/ME Working Group will produce guidance aimed at improving the quality of this care and treatment. We have consistently emphasised the importance of close partnership between the NHS and local authorities to plan and commission services and have set in hand a number of initiatives, including legislative change, to strengthen this.

Children (Employment)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to introduce legislation to bring ILO Convention 138 relating to children's employment into UK law; and if he will make a statement. [76202]

Mr. Hutton: An announcement of the results of the review of the ratification of International Labour Organisation Convention 138 will be made in the near future.

Hospitals (Phones)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue instructions to hospitals that normal BT call charges should apply to all payphones within their hospitals. [76149]

Mr. Denham: None. The provision of a telephone service for use by patients and visitors, including the choice of provider, is a matter for individual trusts. Detailed guidance on the setting of fees and charges by National Health Service trusts is contained in Her Majesty's Treasury publication "The Fees and Charges Guide". Where a service is to be provided by a third party, trusts should ensure best value both for the hospital and the user by seeking tenders from potential operators.

Dental Services

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of dentists that need to be trained in England to ensure (a) the maintenance of the present level of service and (b) that his dental health targets are met. [75438]

Mr. Denham: On 31 March 1998 there were 19,711 dentists practising in the National Health Service in Great Britain, an increase of 2.6 per cent. on the year before. Numbers of dental students are also at a record level. In the 1997–98 academic year there were 3,929 undergraduate dental students in medical schools, an increase of 2 per cent. on the 1996–97 year.

A sub-group of the Dental Advisory Group on Medical Education and Training, which has been established to consider future workforce requirements, will hold its first meeting on 10 June 1999. Its discussions will be informed by our forthcoming dental strategy.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the need for facilities for dento-alveolar surgery. [75442]

Mr. Denham: Dento-alveolar surgery is mostly carried out within the facilities of primary dental care. Dento-alveolar surgery requiring more specialist treatment is provided by the hospital dental services. It is for health authorities to assess local need for such facilities.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the cost of clinical waste collection and water service charges to general dental practices; to what extent these costs are accounted for in the payments made to dentists for NHS work; and what plans he has to make changes in the reimbursement of dentists for these particular costs. [75437]

Mr. Denham: Information on the cost of clinical waste collection and water service charges is not available centrally. As independent contractors, general dental practitioners are responsible for meeting all their own practice expenses. The fees payable to general dental practitioners reflect this fact. We have no plans to change this at present.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many treatments requiring prior approval from the Dental Practice Board were submitted in each of the last three years; how many were refused; and what was the (a) shortest, (b) longest and (c) average time taken to consider these requests. [75435]

Mr. Denham: The number of prior approvals received by the Dental Practice Board which cover England, Wales and the Isle of Man and the number of these referred for investigation is given in the table.

	Prior approval applications	Number referred
1995–96	548,753	not available
1996–97	548,741	33,126

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the number of dentists required in each health authority to provide a satisfactory level of service; [75439]

(2) if he will make a statement about (a) the availability of dental services in rural areas and (b) the steps being taken to improve access to dentists in rural areas. [75426]

Mr. Denham: Health authorities have responsibility for monitoring the oral health and general dental services (GDS) in their area. If a health authority is concerned about the level of GDS provision in its area, it may ask the Secretary of State for Health to use his powers under Section 56 of the NHS Act 1977, to approve the funding of proposals submitted under the Investing in Dentistry initiative, which we launched in September 1997, or, where appropriate, seek approval to employ a salaried dentist(s).

The Personal Dental Services scheme (PDS) was set up under the NHS (Primary Care) Act 1997 to address local service problems and tailor services to meet local need, including in rural areas. PDS enables dentists and National Health Service trusts, working with health authorities, to develop and pilot new ways of delivering NHS dentistry. The first wave of pilot schemes began in October 1998.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was (a) the public expenditure estimate and (b) the cost outturn for general dental services in England in 1997–98. [75427]

Mr. Denham: General Dental Services (GDS) is not cash limited, so there is no set annual budget. The original vote provision and final expenditure in the GDS in England is shown in the table.

General Dental Service: 1997–98 Expenditure

£ million

England	Gross expenditure	Net expenditure
Provision made in main estimate	1,405.8	1,021.5
Outturn	1,349.3	959.1

Gross expenditure includes all fees and allowances payable to general dental practitioners, which cover their income and practice expenses, together with supplementary cost such as employers' superannuation contributions, payments of salaried dentists who provide GDS care in certain localities, and refunds to patients who incorrectly paid dental charges. Net expenditure shows costs after taking into account all dental charges collected from patients.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about current audit and peer review projects for general dental practitioners, setting out (a) his assessment of their effectiveness and value for money and (b) his future plans for such projects. [75430]

Mr. Denham: As our consultation paper A First Class Service indicated, participation of doctors and dentists in clinical audit schemes is central to our strategy for improving the quality of health care. Local audit and peer review advisory panels assess dental schemes and those dentists who participate are required to prepare resumes of their experience. A recent analysis of a sample of these reports showed that 89 per cent. of dentists viewed the process positively and 63 per cent. had acquired knowledge with a direct, beneficial impact on patient care. We have allocated £1.5 million for these schemes in 1999–2000 and have no plans to change the current arrangements.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list by health authority area the average number of dental registrations per dentist; if he will make a statement on the impact on dental health of differences in the average number; and what measures are being taken to reduce such differences; [75534]

(2) how many adults have been seen by dentists under NHS regulations in each health authority area in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [75533]

Mr. Denham: The table gives, by health authority (HA), the number of registered dental patients on 31 January 1999 as compared to the number of General Dental Service (GDS) dentists at 31 December 1998. Differences in these numbers between HAs will reflect differences in the level of commitment of dentists to the GDS (lower registrations per dentist are likely to indicate a lower level of commitment to the GDS by the dentists involved) and other factors. Figures on the number of adult patients seen by GDS dentists are not available.

General Dental Service: Number of patient registrations[1] per dentist[2,3] by health authority

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in each of the last three years what percentage of all types of dental treatments was referred to a dental reference officer for scrutiny; and what percentage was declared to be (a) of poor quality and (b) invalid. [75433]

Mr. Denham: In 1996–97 and 1997–98 about 0.5 per cent. and 0.6 per cent. respectively of courses of treatment scheduled for payment for England, Wales and the Isle of Man were referred to a dental reference office for scrutiny. Of those patients seen, the dental officer had a major or fundamental disagreement with the treatment in 1.75 per cent. of cases in 1996–97 and 1.37 per cent. of cases in 1997–98. Information for 1995–96 is not available. These percentages cover both poor quality and invalid treatments. The dental officer was unable to comment in 3 per cent. of cases seen in 1996–97 and 4 per cent. in 1997–98.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists are employed by each NHS trust in their community dental services; how many children were treated in the last year for which figures are available in each trust; and how many treatments were made. [75440]

Mr. Denham: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Table 1 gives the number of child patients, aged 15 years and under, seen for treatment by the community dental service (CDS) by health authority (HA) in England during the financial year 1997–98. The activity for each Trust is allocated to the HA for which the work is carried out. Table 1 also includes information on the number of episodes of care for children aged 15 years or under. An episode of care is a series of face to face contacts with a member of the CDS to complete a treatment plan.

The number of CDS dentists on 30 September 1997 is given in Table 2 by HA in England based on the location of the NHS trusts.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of treatments requiring prior approval from the Dental Practice Board was submitted to dental reference officers for further examination in each of the last three years; what percentage was refused; and what was (a) the shortest, (b) the longest and (c) the average time taken to consider these submissions. [75434]

Mr. Denham: 6 per cent. of prior approval applications in England, Wales and the Isle of Man were referred to dental reference officers for further investigation in 1996–97 and 71 per cent. of these patients were seen, for example, 4 per cent. of the total number of applications. In 1997–98, 9 per cent. were investigated further and 56 per cent. of patients were seen, for example, 5 per cent. of the total number of applications. Information for 1995–96 is not available.

Of those patients seen in 1996–97, the dental officer had a fundamental disagreement with the treatment plan in 0.47 per cent. of cases and had a major disagreement in 4.72 per cent. of cases. For patients seen in 1997–98, there was a fundamental disagreement in 0.38 per cent. of cases and a major disagreement in 3.48 per cent. of cases. However, refusal to give approval takes place only after further consultation at the Dental Practice Board.

In 1996–97 the quickest approval was made in 45 days, the average time taken was 85 days and the longest time taken was 138 days. In 1997–98 the quickest approval was made in 46 days, the average time taken was 97 days and the longest time taken was 124 days.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of dentists' earnings was made up of non-NHS work in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [75313]

Mr. Denham: Information on non-National Health Service dental earnings is not collected. However, an annual Inland Revenue Survey gives information on the total gross earnings (i.e. including both NHS and private work) of General Dental Service (GDS) dentists, allowing a comparison with total gross GDS earnings. This indicates that the percentage of GDS dentists' earnings made up of non-GDS work over the last five years has been in the order of:

1991–92: 4 per cent.

1992–93: 5 per cent.

1993–94: 10 per cent.

1994–95: 14 per cent.

1995–96 and 1996–97 combined about 25 per cent.

The percentage estimate for the combined year 1995–96 and 1996–97 is not on the same basis as the estimates for the earlier years. The total gross earnings were obtained from a special data collection covering non-associate dentists only and the accounting years eligible for inclusion in the survey were less restrictive.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the value of dentists participating in information management and information technology programmes; and what plans he has to provide financial support for such in-service development. [75535]

Mr. Denham: 10,983 National Health Service general dental practitioners in England and Wales are already linked electronically to the Dental Practice Board (DPB). Grants of £900 are made by the DPB, when dentists first establish electronic links to them, to assist with the purchase of suitable computer systems.

The value of information management and technology for dentists is one of the issues that will be considered by the team appointed to carry out an evaluation of Personal Dental Services pilots.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those firms which have bid for NHS private finance initiative deals for each of the last five years; and which of those bids were successful. [76487]

Mr. Denham: Details of individual Private Finance Initiative (PFI) schemes with a capital value of less than £10 million are not available centrally. Information is given in the table on the consortia selected to bid for the scheme and the successful consortium for those schemes with a capital of over £10 million which have reached financial close.

Psychiatric Services (Children)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evaluation his Department has undertaken of the policies of (a) local authority social services departments and (b) NHS psychiatric services in respect of children excluded from school. [76479]

Mr. Hutton: The Department has made no such evaluation. The Department is, however, working closely with the Department for Education and Employment to encourage joint local initiatives to help tackle school truancy and exclusion.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children have been admitted to NHS psychiatric care in each year since 1992. [76482]

Mr. Hutton: The table shows the estimated number of admissions, under the child and adolescent psychiatry specialty to National Health Service trusts in England from 1991–92 to 1997–98.

NHS Training and Expenditure

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what data his Department collects on expenditure on NHS training and education, and its availability; and if he will make a statement. [76483]

Mr. Denham: The Department collects comprehensive expenditure information on non-medical education and training and medical education and training funded from the national levies. Expenditure information has been published annually in each of the levy accountability reports commencing with the 1997–98 financial year.

Doctors (Complaints)

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that a patient making an allegation to the General Medical Council about the conduct of a doctor will have automatic access to all relevant notes and correspondence. [76759]

Mr. Denham: This is a matter for the General Medical Council.

NHS Charges

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by what percentage NHS charges for (a) sight tests, (b) glasses, (c) travel to hospital, (d) dental treatment and (e) prescription have risen since December 1998. [76757]

Mr. Denham: Prescription charges and charges for dental treatment have not risen since December 1998. There are no charges for National Health Service sight tests (which will be available to everyone aged 60 or over from 1 April) or for travel to hospital. Children and people on low incomes are eligible for NHS spectacle vouchers which they may use to buy glasses of their choice.

For changes from 1 April, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) on 25 February 1999, Official Report, columns 429–30.

Brit Awards

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those Ministers in his Department who were present at the recent Brit awards in an official capacity, indicating the organisation acting as their sponsor or host. [76646]

Mr. Hutton: None.

Pasteurised Eggs

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to revise or reissue guidance on the use of pasteurised eggs. [76652]

Mr. Hutton: We advised caterers to use pasteurised egg in uncooked egg dishes over ten years ago. That advice continues to be disseminated by the Department in advice published by the Chief Medical Officer in 1997, for example. There are no plans, at present, to revise this guidance.

Nursing Vacancies (Oxfordshire)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacant nursing places there are at (a) The Oxford Radcliffe Hospital NHS Trust, (b) Nuffield Orthopaedic Centre NHS Trust, (c) Radcliffe Infirmary NHS Trust, (d) Oxfordshire Community Health NHS Trust and (e) Oxfordshire Mental Healthcare NHS Trust; and what the corresponding figures were 12 months ago. [76762]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

The hon. Member may wish to contact chairs at the trusts for further details.

Clinical Negligence

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by NHS region the number and value of clinical negligence claims settled by individual trusts, for each of the last five years. [76488]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available.

Departmental Policies

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what systems he has in place to ensure that policies being developed by his Department are subject to a crime impact (a) assessment and (b) audit and are not likely to lead to enhanced criminal opportunities. [72681]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 24 February 1999]: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), on 24 February 1999, Official Report, columns 311–12.

European Defence Policy

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions he has held with the non-NATO members of the European Union on the future of European defence policy; and if he will make a statement; [76261]

(2) what discussions his Department has had with the countries associated with the Western European Union on the future of the WEU and the European Union. [76265]

Mr. George Robertson: We have invited all our Partners and Allies, including all countries associated with the Western European Union and non-NATO members of the European Union, to join us in thinking afresh about how to strengthen both European defence capabilities and the European Union's Common Foreign and Security Policy. This initiative has been very positively received, and I look forward to continuing the discussions with my colleagues over the coming months.

External Consultants

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names of external consultants indicating the fees agreed in each case and nature of studies undertaken since 2 May 1997. [74745]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 4 March 1999]: Full details of consultancy engagements since 1 May 1997 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, I can confirm that, in financial year 1997–98, the total expenditure on external consultancy by the MOD was £148.1 million involving more than 3,000 separate consultancy appointments and, in the first half of this financial year, £62.8 million involving over 1,000 appointments. Details of this expenditure is placed in the Library of the House annually.

The work undertaken by external consultants since May 1997 has included specialist input to procurement programmes and support to a number of Department efficiency initiatives, including market testing, the introduction of Resource Accounting and Budgeting, the review of the Department's UK estate and the development and implementation of SMART procurement.

Heathlands

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when his Department expects to complete management plans for its sites containing lowland heathland in accordance with section 5.1.6 of the costed habitat action plan for lowland heathland in the United Kingdom Biodiversity Steering Group report; [76495]

(2) how many sites owned by his Department hold more than 10 hectares of lowland heathland; how many of these sites are notified as sites of special scientific interest; and how many have management plans with specific targets for the maintenance and re-creation of lowland heathland agreed with the statutory nature conservation agencies; [76494]

(3) what is the extent of lowland heathland owned by his Department; and what proportion of the United Kingdom total of lowland heathland this constitutes; [76493]

(4) what sums his Department has allocated to bring lowland heathland habitats on its land into favourable nature conservation condition since May 1997; [76498]

(5) how much of the target for the re-establishment of lowland heathland in the United Kingdom that was published in 1995 in the United Kingdom Biodiversity Steering Group report his Department has achieved on its land to date; and how much it is planning to achieve on its land by the year 2005; [76496]

(6) what assessment he has made of the nature conservation condition of heathlands owned by his Department; how many of these sites were considered to be in favourable condition; and how many were in an unfavourable condition at the last assessment. [76497]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is not held centrally and in order to provide a full response it will have to be collated from disparate sources around the country, making reference as necessary, to the statutory conservation bodies. I will write to the hon. Member once this process has been completed and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Armed Forces (Recruitment)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government to support the Optional Protocol to the UN Convention on Human Rights to raise the age of recruitment to the armed forces to the age of 18 years. [74308]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The UK has played, and will continue to play, a full and active part in negotiations on the Optional Protocol to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. We consider our current recruiting and deployment policies to be in line with the principles that are being sought internationally. We recruit only volunteers into the Armed Forces, and then only with the written consent of parents/guardians in the case of personnel aged under 18. The Services provide young people with a rewarding and challenging career, together with the opportunity to develop skills and civilian recognised qualifications in a wide range of trades and occupations.

Indonesia

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Memorandum of Understanding signed in November 1991 by the British and Indonesian Governments is still in force; when it was last revised; and what assessment he has made of the benefits the Memorandum of Understanding has resulted in for British Governments. [76114]

Mr. Spellar: The MOU signed by the MOD with the Government of the Republic of Indonesia in 1991 made provision for UK MOD support to the sale to the Indonesia Navy of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Green Rover. All arrangements provided for under the terms of the MOU have now been completed and the MOU is, to all intents and purposes, no longer in force. I understand that the MOU has achieved its aim of ensuring the efficient conduct of business over this sale.

Operation Desert Storm

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people under the age of 18 years were in active service during Operation Desert Storm. [75015]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

HMS Vengeance

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date HMS Vengeance is expected to start contractors' sea trials; what was the original planned date; and if he will make a statement. [76234]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 15 March 1999]: HMS Vengeance is due to start Contractor's Sea Trials later in the year. The exact date is classified for reasons of physical security. The currently planned date is later than the original, due to the need to replace components found to be defective during system testing at the shipbuilding. The components have now been changed and the submarine's systems are performing well.

RAF Logistic Support Services

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are currently employed by the RAF Logistic Support Services and how many there were at its establishment; on what date it published its report for the year 1997–98; and what was the cost of production of the report. [76617]

Mr. Doug Henderson: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Logistics Support Services Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from P. Rawson to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 16 March 1999:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the number of people employed by the RAF Logistics Support Services and the production date and cost of its report for the year 1997–98 as this matter falls within the areas of responsibility of the Chief Executive of Logistics Support Services Agency. The Chief Executive, who is away on business, has agreed the content of this reply.

On Agency vesting in December 1996, the established strength of Logistics Support Services was 1201 personnel; the current establishment is 1107.

Logistics Support Services was not directed to produce an Annual Report for 1997–98 and therefore incurred no costs. The first published report and accounts will be for 1998–99.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on progress in implementing the recommendations of the Glidewell review of the Crown Prosecution Service. [77020]

The Attorney-General: I refer the right hon. Member to my written answer on 30 November 1998, Official Report, column 67, to my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), which set out the interim response of the Government to the Review of the Crown Prosecution Service. On that day I placed in the Library of the House a chart setting out the position in relation to each recommendation.

The Crown Prosecution Service and other Departments with responsibility for criminal justice matters have continued work on consideration and implementation of the Report. The most significant recent steps have been the appointment by the Director of Public Prosecutions of Chief Crown Prosecutors and Area Business Managers for each of the proposed 42 areas of the Crown Prosecution Service, which will come into being in April 1999. As I told the House on 30 November 1998, I expect to put a full response to the Review of the CPS before the House by the end of June.

PRIME MINISTER

Security and Intelligence Service

Jacqui Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the Staff Counsellor for the Security and Intelligence Services. [76586]

The Prime Minister: Sir Christopher France GCB has served as Staff Counsellor for the Security and Intelligence Services since April 1995. He will retire from this post on 31 March 1999 and I express the Government's gratitude to him for the way in which he has fulfilled the duties of this very sensitive post. Sir John Chilcot, GCB who was Permanent Under-Secretary of State at the Northern Ireland Office until 1997, will succeed him as Staff Counsellor from 1 April 1999.

Iraq (Medical Goods)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his letter to the hon. Member for Linlithgow of 9 March, if he will examine the UN's procedures in relation to the distribution of medical goods to meet humanitarian needs which have arrived in Iraq since the end of 1996; and what assessment he has made of the memorandum from the Under Secretary of the Iraqi Foreign Office on this subject, a copy of which has been sent to him. [76781]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 15 March 1999]: According to the terms of the Memorandum of Understanding between the Government of Iraq and the United Nations on implementation of the "oil for food" programme, it is Iraq, not the UN, which is responsible for the distribution of medical supplies in central and southern Iraq. Iraq's record on distribution is woeful. According to the UN Secretary General's latest report of 22 February on the implementation of "oil for food", over half the medicines and medical supplies which have arrived in Iraq since the start of the "oil for food" programme have accumulated in warehouses. These supplies are worth over $275 million. The Secretary General also noted that the quantity of medical equipment in warehouses was "alarmingly high".

This issue is one which will no doubt be considered by the panel established by the UN Security Council on 30 January to assess the humanitarian situation in Iraq. We would support proposals from the panel to increase the role of the UN in distributing medical supplies in central and southern Iraq in the interest of getting these supplies to the Iraqi people.

It should be noted that in the northern governorates, where distribution is carried out by UN agencies, no problems in the distribution of medical goods were noted in the Secretary General's report.

The Iraqi Memorandum is an unconvincing attempt by Iraq to divert responsibility for the distribution problems in the centre and south onto others.

President-elect Obasanjo

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister what communication he has had with the President-elect of Nigeria. [76964]

The Prime Minister: Following the elections on 27 February I sent a message of congratulations and a letter to President-elect Obasanjo.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met President Obasanjo in Nigeria on 10 March. We look forward to welcoming him to Britain soon.

Select Committees (Leaked Documents)

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 169, on leaked documents, if (a) he, (b) civil servants in his Department or (c) special advisers in his Department have (i) had sights of drafts of select committee reports in whole or in part, from any civil servant, special adviser or Minister or (ii) been informed of conclusions of Select Committee reports by any civil servant, special adviser or Minister prior to their publication by the select committees. [76743]

The Prime Minister: In my answer of 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 169, what I say about members of Select Committees is equally true as regards civil servants, special advisers or Ministers.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Leaded Petrol

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 27 January 1999, Official Report, columns 253–54, on leaded petrol, what estimate his Department has made of the costs of the (a) engine adjustments and (b) lead replacement petrol to motorists. [72327]

Dr. Reid: Lead replacement petrol is expected to become widely available by the end of this year, enabling those motorists that currently use leaded petrol—estimated at approximately 5.3 million—to switch seamlessly to this fuel without any engine adjustments and, hence, no additional associated costs.

Indeed, of these 5.3 million motorists, it is estimated that some 0.7 million could make immediate savings on their fuel bills by switching to ordinary premium unleaded petrol now. A further 2.3 million could do so with timing adjustments to their engines costing in the order of £50.

The remaining 2.3 million vehicles will need lead replacement petrol or, alternatively, separate additives to provide lubrication to critical engine parts. However, most of these vehicles can have engine modifications that would permit them also to save on running costs by using premium unleaded petrol. Such modifications, which are typically £200-£400 for a small family car, but higher for more sophisticated or specialist vehicles, would be offset by subsequent savings on running costs.

Council Tax Benefit

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received since the introduction of the changes to the regulations relating to council tax benefit on 1 April 1998. [76268]

Ms Armstrong: We consulted on our detailed proposals for council tax benefit subsidy limitation on 2 December 1998. We received 129 representations. I have placed in the Library a list of those that responded.

SSSIs

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the implications for Sites of Special Scientific Interest of his access to the countryside proposals. [76275]

Mr. Meacher: We do not expect a new statutory right of access on foot to have a significant impact generally on the scientific interest of the land concerned. Provision will be made to close land, or otherwise restrict access, on nature conservation grounds, where this is justified. Such land may include areas notified as Sites of Special Scientific Interest.

Countryside Access (MOD Land)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the application of his proposals for access to the countryside to Ministry of Defence property; what assessment he has made of the effect of the proposals on (i) security and (ii) property prices; and what consultations he has held with Ministers in the Ministry of Defence on this issue. [76280]

Mr. Meacher: The Government's proposal for a new statutory of access to open countryside will apply to mountain, moor, heath, down and registered common land. Provision will be made for the Ministry of Defence to continue to close land, or otherwise restrict access, where necessary, in the interests of defence. Provision will also be made to close land, or otherwise restrict access, on grounds of conservation, land management and health and safety. The new right of access will not apply to developed land or to agricultural land other than that used for extensive grazing.

An economic appraisal study for the Government by independent consultants supports the view that the economic impact on property prices is likely to be limited.

In developing the Government's proposals, I have consulted Ministerial colleagues in all Departments with an interest, including the Ministry of Defence.

Home Energy Efficiency Schemes

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many home energy efficiency schemes have been introduced since 1 May 1997. [76435]

Mr. Meacher: My Department funds the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme and a wide range of programmes which are run by the Energy Saving Trust to improve energy efficiency in the home. The Trust has introduced three new schemes since 1 May 1997. They are schemes to promote the development of energy services, encourage the installation of small scale Combined Heat and Power in residential premises and promote the installation of energy efficient boilers and heating controls. In addition a large number of schemes is run by others, including local authorities and electricity suppliers.

Recycling

Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his Department's future programme for encouraging recovery and recycling of household waste. [76209]

Mr. Meacher: We are revising the existing waste strategy for England and Wales. A draft will be produced later in the Spring for consultation, and will include among other things our proposals for dealing with household waste. The final strategy will be published by the end of the year.

Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those people he has appointed to public bodies since 1 November 1998, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed and if they receive remuneration. [76415]

Mr. Meale: The information requested has been placed in the Library of the House.

Jubilee Line

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the results of London Transport's Jubilee Line Extension cost review; and if he will make a statement. [76634]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 730, to the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway).

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 730, concerning the cost of the Jubilee Line extension, when the cost review undertaken in August 1998 was completed; and when the results were made available to ministers. [76752]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Transport's August 1998 Jubilee Line Extension cost review was completed in August 1998 and its results were issued to my Department immediately after they had been submitted to the LT Board. A copy was made available to the Secretary of State's Agent, Ove Arup, who commented on it in a report to Ministers dated 11 August 1998.

Climate Change

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards the European Community strategy on climate change. [76193]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 12 March 1999]: The UK plays a leading role in developing and arguing the Community's position in international negotiations on climate change.

Within the Community, the UK brokered the agreement reached in June 1998 sharing out the EU's 8 per cent. reduction target from Kyoto, under which the UK took on a share of -12.5 per cent. The UK Presidency also brokered a set of key agreed areas where policies and measures at Community level were called for to support action taken by Member States to meet their targets.

Black Cabs

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 164, concerning black cabs, if a taxi licensed by the Public Carriage Office will be permitted also to be licensed by another licensing authority to ply for hire outside the new Metropolitan Police District boundary. [76473]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 15 March 1999]: This decision will rest with the relevant local licensing authority. But I can see a number of practical reasons, particularly in relation to taximeters and licence plates, why a local authority would choose not to grant a second taxi licence for a vehicle which has already been licensed as a London taxi.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of taxi cabs that will be affected within each suburban licensing sector by the realignment of the Metropolitan Police District. [76474]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 15 March 1999]: Of the 22,700 London licensed taxi drivers, 1,365 hold suburban licences which entitle them to ply for hire in one or more of the nine suburban sectors which will be directly affected by the Metropolitan Police District boundary change. 444 drivers hold licences covering sectors 3A (Epsom) and 3B (Carshalton); 338 covering sectors 1A (Woodford); 237 covering sectors 4A (Kingston) and 4B (Hounslow); 215 covering sector 5B (Ruislip); and 131 covering sectors 6A (Finchley), 6B (Wood Green) and 6C (Walthamstow). Drivers holding suburban licences will still be entitled to ply for hire throughout the relevant suburban zone; the Public Carriage Office is currently reviewing the boundaries of suburban sectors in the light of the Metropolitan Police District boundary change, with a view to ensuring that each sector is of reasonable size. In addition, the 20,400 drivers with all-London licenses will continue to be entitled to ply for hire throughout the Metropolitan Police District (as defined by the new boundary).

Railway Stations (Access)

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussion he has had with the rail regulator on the obligations to be placed on Railtrack and train operating companies regarding access to railway stations for people with disabilities when part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 takes effect; and if he will list them. [77158]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department keeps in close touch with the Rail Regulator on mobility issues generally, although we have had no specific discussions on these issues. In relation to station access, Railtrack and the train operating companies, are subject to the provisions of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act in the same way as any other service provider.

From October 1999, they will have to take reasonable steps to change practices, policies or procedures which make it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled people to use a service; provide auxiliary aids or services, for example induction loops or information in Braille, which would enable disabled people to use a service; and overcome physical barriers by providing a service by a reasonable alternative method.

From 2004, they will have to take reasonable steps to remove, alter, or provide reasonable means of avoiding physical features that make it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled people to use a service. For example, the provision of a ramp to allow wheelchair access into a station.

Railtrack and the train operating companies were informed about these requirements at a seminar organised by my Department and the DfEE at the end of last year.

Thames Gateway (Rail Links)

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 149, on the Thames Gateway, what assessment he has made of the regeneration potential of (a) the proposed Woolwich rail tunnel, (b) a rail and (c) a rapid transit link to Thamesmead. [76769]

Mr. Caborn: The regeneration potential of new cross river public transport links were assessed within the East Thames Appraisal Framework report, commissioned by the Government Office for London, which reported in July 1998. The options considered in the report included a rail tunnel at Woolwich, and light rail and guided bus links to Thamesmead.

GM Vegetables

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the applications he has received in respect of genetically modified vegetables where the purpose of modification is to enable contaminants to be removed from soil; what is the approved disposal route for such vegetables; and if he will make a statement. [76509]

Mr. Meacher: I have received no applications for consent to release this type of genetically modified crop.

Traffic Reduction

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his oral answer of 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 172, if he will list the areas where he aims to secure a real reduction in traffic levels. [76513]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 458–59.

Train Punctuality

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to eliminate the setting of artificially late expected arrival times at destinations by train operating companies where the object is to meet punctuality targets. [76516]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Passenger Service Requirements (PSR) in franchise agreements prescribe maximum journey times based on pre-privatisation practice. Train operating companies' timetables must comply with PSRs.

Soil Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has received from ACRE of the recent report from the Soil Association on genetically modified crops, with particular reference to the distance beyond the precautionary 200 metre boundary around genetically modified plants which pollen can spread; if he will publish the evidence for that assessment; and what assessment he has made of their conclusions. [76518]

Mr. Meacher: The Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment will discuss the Soil Association commissioned report on the dispersal of maize pollen at their next meeting on 25 March. Its advice will then be made public through the minutes of the meeting.

Retroviruses

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those retroviruses approved for release into the environment, giving in each case the date of approval given for release. [76504]

Mr. Meacher: No genetically modified retroviruses have been approved for release into environment in the UK.

Rural Railways

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the railway routes classified as rural where the present frequency of service exceeds that required under the relevant franchise agreement, giving in each case (i) the minimum frequency required, (ii) that currently applicable and (iii) that applicable in 1988. [76506]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy in respect of the present minimum frequency levels required by current franchise agreements in respect of rural railway services. [76505]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The present minimum frequency levels in respect of all services are matters of contract. We have made it clear we are prepared to renegotiate existing franchise agreements if greater investment and better performance can be obtained for passengers and on terms that represent value for money for the taxpayer.

Railway Security

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in respect of the annual report 1997–98 of the Director and Co-ordinator of Transport Security, (i) if he will list the 37 stations referred to in Paragraph 24, (ii) if he will list the problems identified as requiring rectification in Paragraph 24, (iii) how many bomb-warnings, in Appendix A Paragraph 3, proved to relate to bombs and (iv) how many (a) suspicious packages and (b) bomb threats, in Appendix A Paragraph 6 proved to relate to bombs or other material capable of endangering life. [76507]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In answer to (i) and (ii), for security reasons it would not be appropriate to reveal the actual stations inspected or the issues identified for rectification. The stations inspected included major stations throughout England, Scotland and Wales.

(iii) None.

(iv) During the period 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998 no suspicious packages proved to be actual devices. One bomb threat proved to be a device and this exploded at Leeds Station in April 1997.

Community Transport

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish the report into the role of voluntary and community transport services. [76511]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A draft of the final report was presented last week to the project steering group which includes representatives of the Community Transport Association, the Rural Development Commission and local authorities. Subject to their comments and final drafting changes, it should be possible to publish the report within the next few weeks.

Traffic Increases

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his oral answer of 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 172, what estimate he has made of the overall increase in traffic levels by 2010 having taken into account those areas where road traffic levels will be reduced. [76514]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The answers I gave to the hon. Member on 12 January 1999, Official Report, column 189, explained that my Department is undertaking further analysis of the expected effect on traffic of the policies in last year's Transport White Paper—taking into account information from local authorities on what measures they plan to introduce—in order to inform reports under the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998. The first such report will be published by the end of this year.

National Rail Timetable

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many train journeys were advertised in the national rail timetable for each year from 1980 to date. [76517]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested is not available.

Greater London

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning the European Commission's assessment of the levels of (a) wealth and (b) deprivation in Greater London. [77167]

Mr. Raynsford: This Department has received no representations concerning the European Commission's assessment of the levels of (a) wealth and (b) deprivation in Greater London.

Regional Expenditure

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the south-east region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77026]

(2) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the central region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77022]

(3) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the east midlands region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77027]

(4) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the west midlands region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77021]

(5) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the north east region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77030]

(6) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the Yorks and Humber region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77028]

(7) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the south-west region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77023]

(8) the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the north-west region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced; [77029]

(9) what the reduction in expenditure by English Partnerships in 2000–01 will be relative to that for 1999–2000 in the eastern region of England; and in what areas spending will be reduced. [77024]

Mr. Meale: From 1 April 1999, responsibility for the regional elements of the land and property budget (with the exception of London which will transfer a year later) will move from English Partnerships to the Regional Development Agencies. Regional budgets for 2000–01 have not yet been confirmed. The decision on budgets for that and subsequent years needs to wait for RDA regional strategies and corporate plans.

The grant in aid voted by Parliament for the total land and property programme will be £208m for 2000–01, compared with £216m[1] in 1999–2000, as set out in the CSR settlement. The balance of funding for the programme is made up from capital receipts.

[1] The CSR settlement for 1999–2000 is £230m, but £15m of this total is ring-fenced for the Greenwich Millennium project.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what targets he has set the East of England RDA for 2000–01. [76942]

Mr. Meale: Targets have not yet been set for any RDAs for 2000–01.

RDA Hearings

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which officials in his Department attended the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee hearings on RDAs (a) at Westminster and (b) elsewhere; what was the purpose of their attendance; and what was the cost. [76941]

Mr. Caborn: In addition to those from my Department and the Government Offices who gave evidence to the Committee, the following attended the sessions:

(a) Westminster

Date of session	Number of officials attending
16 February	3
2 March	2
9 March	6

(b) Elsewhere

Date of session	Number of officials attending
22 February, Newcastle	3
22 February, Leeds	1
23 February, Manchester	2
23 February, Birmingham	1
25 February, Chelmsford	1

The purpose of their attendance was to inform their work in briefing those appearing as witnesses and/or staff development. On 9 March, the officials included a private secretary and two press officers.

The cost, over and above salaries (standard class travel, and subsistence) was £306.48.

Environment Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the outcome of the Environment Council held in Brussels on 11 and 12 March; and if he will make a statement. [77248]

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the issues discussed at the Environment Council on 11 and 12 March, indicating the positions adopted by the UK Government. [76201]

Mr. Meacher: I represented the United Kingdom at the Environment Council which took place in Brussels on the 11 March.

The Council reached a common position on the proposal for a Water Framework Directive following the receipt of the European Parliament's opinion in February. This is a major environmental proposal which will set demanding but achievable targets for improvements in the quality of both surface and groundwaters to be delivered through co-ordinated plans, where necessary between Member States, for each river basin. It was agreed to postpone a final decision on the End of Life Vehicles Directive until the next Council meeting in June.

Discussions took place on Council Conclusions establishing the Community's negotiating position on climate change for the next round of global negotiations. These focused in particular on the definition of a concrete ceiling on the use of emissions trading and other off-set mechanisms under the Kyoto Protocol. A final consensus was not reached on this despite protracted negotiations, and Ministers will return to this issue in the near future.

Council Conclusions were adopted on the Commissions negotiations with Japanese and Korean car manufacturers, which seek to secure an equivalent voluntary agreement to that reached with ACEA last October. This is part of the EU Strategy on reducing carbon dioxide emissions from cars. The Conclusions impress on the Commission to conclude their negotiations by May and report back to the Council by June.

First Ministerial debates were also held on two other dossiers. The first, on a proposal to amend the Directive limiting emissions of certain pollutants into the air from large combustion plants, is an integral part of the Commission's Acidification Strategy. It will reduce emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen dioxides, both of which can potentially cause acidification and health problems. During discussions on whether the directive should cover existing plants emissions, I argued that these were better covered by the current IPPC directive and National Emissions Ceilings Directive being developed by the Commission. The second debate was held on a proposal that would allow voluntary participation by organisations in a Community eco-management and audit scheme. Both of these proposals will return to the Council in June, along with a proposal for a directive on the incineration of waste. At this Council the Commission reported on the progress of negotiations in working group of this dossier.

I welcomed the Presidency announcement on its plans to reach a common position at the June Council on the proposal for a revision to the 90–220 Directive controlling the release and marketing of genetically modified organisms. In addition, Council Conclusions were agreed that reflect on the suspension of discussions on the biosafety protocol in Cartegena last month, and agree that a strategy be developed with a view to completing the negotiations.

Lorry Accidents

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the number of road accidents involving lorries for each year since 1980. [77211]

Dr. Reid: The number of road accidents involving a Heavy Goods Vehicle (HGV) is shown in the following table.

Road accidents involving at least one HGV[1]: 1980–97

Year	Number of accidents[2]
1980	14,117
1981	13,283
1982	13,307
1983	12,328
1984	12,950
1985	13,073
1986	13,435
1987	13,642
1988	14,775
1989	16,107
1990	15,063
1991	13,616
1992	13,016
1993	13,173
1994	13,178
1995	12,613
1996	12,426
1997	13,122

[1] HGV: From 1 January 1994 the weight definition changed to those vehicles over 3.5 tonnes maximum permissible gross weight. Prior to that these vehicles were defined as goods vehicles over 1.524 tonnes unladen weight and included vehicles with six or more tyres, some four wheel vehicles with extra large bodies and larger rear tyres and tractor units travelling without their usual tailer.

[2] Accidents may involve more than one HGV.

Bus Service Partnerships

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many quality partnerships for delivery of bus services are currently in place; and what plans he has to put such partnerships on a statutory basis. [77175]

Dr. Reid: I am aware of over 30 quality partnerships in existence, and more in prospect. We announced in the Transport White Paper our intention to provide statutory backing for quality partnerships and will be publishing further details shortly.

Government Grants

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what grants each (a) unitary, (b) shire county, (c) shire district, (d) metropolitan district and (e) London borough council received for 1998–99 from central Government other than those included in the total external support figure; and if they were ring-fenced for any purpose; [76789]

(2) what grants each (a) unitary, (b) shire county, (c) shire district, (d) metropolitan district and (e) London borough council will receive for 1999–2000 from central Government other than those included in the total external support figure; and if they will be ring-fenced for any purpose. [76790]

Ms Armstrong: The information has been placed in the Library of the House. It has been assumed that the question relates to grants for revenue purposes. All revenue grants, apart from those included in total external support, are specific or special grants which are, by definition, earmarked for the purpose indicated by their title.

Shipping

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the measures his Department is taking to develop shipping and ports. [77180]

Dr. Reid: The Government's policy for developing British shipping is set out in the White Paper "British Shipping: Charting a new course", published in December 1998. A ports policy paper is currently out for consultation and should be issued later this year.

Cycling

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish advice to local authorities on good practice in improving the safety and convenience of cycling. [77177]

Dr. Reid: The Department generates a wide range of advice to local authorities on encouraging safer and better conditions for cycling. In addition to our Local Transport Notes and Traffic Advisory Leaflets, we have worked with the Institution of Highways and Transportation, the Cyclists' Touring Club and the Bicycle Association to produce "Cycle-friendly Infrastructure". We have also collaborated with the Institution of Highways and Transportation to produce "Guidelines for Cycle Audit and Cycle Review". Four new Traffic Advisory Leaflets on cycling will be produced in April.
